The framers of the Constitution entrusted the ultimate decision on war and peace to the Congress as a curb on the power of the Executive, out of recognition that on such a fundamental, awesome decision, the Nation must have the collective judgment of the people's body, the Congress. Decisions such as the ones we face today are never easy, but the Constitution intended they should be made here, in the people's body, in this public forum.

The year-long presence of marines in Lebanon shows th vast power of Presidents to take action which commits or, at least, limits the range of options open to Congress. For example, in the present situation, we do not start this debate with a clean slate in Lebanon. The troops are there; the President has committed them and put the Congress in the position of either ratifying that decision or rejecting it, without bringing to bear the kind of independent, far-ranging debate upon the decision to commit troops which should have been made months ago prior to the Presidential action. We are now in the position where there is an almost predetermined cast to this debate: That it is too late to bring to bear an independent judgment on a different course for our policy for Lebanon; there is an unspoken suggestion, an undercurrent to this debate that "pulling out would harm America more than continuing our military presence in Lebanon."

I disagree vigorously with that suggestion. I do not concede that it is too late for Congress to reverse an unfortunate decision, if the circumstances warrant such action. In fact, had Congress been consulted months ago, I very seriously doubt that we would be in the position we are in today, faced with the limited option which we are now debating.

As far as I am concerned, and in the view of most people in my district and elsewhere in Minnesota from whom I have heard in the last several weeks, the burden of proof is on those who argue for continued U.S. military presence under conditions of combat, or, as the War Powers Act calls it—hostilities. Such proof has not been given; withdrawing American troops under current circumstances would not necessarily be an act of abandonment or isolationism, but rather the thoughtful act of a democratic nation which has the strength of its convictions, the courage to change its mind and avoid a prolonged involvement in a foreign conflict to which we are not ideologically committed, behind which the mind of America is not united and from which we may have great difficulty extricating ourselves at a later date because we have so greatly widened and deepened our military involvement.

In addition to the constitutional questions I have raised, I ask a very fundamental and practical question which has in turn been asked of me by anxious parents back home: "When my son's or my neighbors' son's body comes home as a casualty of the conflict in Lebanon, will we be able to explain clearly and convincingly why he died?"

We must ask ourselves again and again and resolve the question in this and in subsequent debate: Will the continued deployment of U.S. Marines in Lebanon serve the interests of the American people; what are those interests in Lebanon; what is our policy in Lebanon? That policy must be clearly enunciated and fully understood by the American people and by this Congress before we can give this or any President an open-ended commitment for any period of time, no matter how long, to widen our military involvement in a distant land.

The debate we are engaged in today is a historic and monumental one. It should have taken place a year ago. The decision we reach will have profound consequences, not only for the American troops stationed on and off Lebanon's shores, but for the entire American people as we decide whether to extend our commitment in Lebanon and under what conditions.

The Obey-Long approach, of which I am a cosponsor and which I am proud to say I have helped fashion, gives the Congress and the American people a much tighter rein on U.S. military involvement in Lebanon, will help us continually review and, as necessary, reshape our policy to reflect changing circumstances and, finally, assure that the decisions we make and the actions taken in consequence of those decisions will have the support of acquiescence of the Congress and the American people. That is in keeping with our constitutional tradition and is in our best foreign policy interests. I urge support of the substitute.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indian (Mr. HAMILTON).

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, this substitute requires the President to invoke War Powers Act by the end of November or at the end of any month thereafter unless he certifies to the Congress that a cease-fire is in effect. If the President has neither certified that a cease-fire exists nor invoked the War Powers Act, all funds for the U.S. military operations in Lebanon would be cut off.

There are several reasons why this substitute should be rejected:

First, the President will not invoke the War Powers Act.

In the event, a cease-fire does not exist, funds would be cut off. That means that all Syria—or any other party—would have to do to get America out would be to break the cease-fire. With this substitute, the United States, thus, hands over to its adversaries the decision about the presence of the marines in Lebanon. Under this substitute, Syria could determine American foreign policy in Lebanon by unilaterally breaking the cease-fire.

Second, this substitute has no policy framework. What are its objectives for the Middle East? For Lebanon? The substitute deals only with our domestic problems—the marines' presence and the War Powers Act. But it does not deal with the objectives of U.S. policy. It is long on tactics, but short on strategy and objectives. It offers no policy for the United States.

Third, this substitute sets up a complicated, cumbersome, and unworkable procedure of monthly evaluations. Our ability to evaluate the complicated situation in Lebanon will be harmed by the procedures this substitute proposes.

Fourth, because of the cumbersome and jerky process proposed, this substitute would make our policies and commitments in Lebanon and the Middle East unsure and vacillating and subject the U.S. policy process to stops, starts, and detours. Instead of showing consistency of purpose, we would project lack of credibility with this resolution. Instead of remaining steadfast on our intent to achieve our policy objectives in Lebanon, withdrawal of all foreign troops; a sovereign independent Lebanon; and security for northern Israel, we would make their attainment less likely.

Fifth, in many respects, this substitute is more open ended than House Joint Resolution 364: There is no termination of authorization; and there is no defined role for Congress if a report is made.

Sixth, much of this resolution hinges on one key word—cease-fire. There may be many cease-fires in Lebanon. The fragile cease-fire today obviously needs to be strengthened. What constitutes a cease-fire and when a cease-fire is broken involves judgments. Can a cease-fire be said to be in effect when there may be sporadic fighting from time to time? Does a cease-fire in Lebanon for the purpose of this resolution simply mean that the marines are not in danger?

Cease-fires as applied to Lebanon are as much a process as a static condition. What useful purpose is served by putting the President in the position of certifying something which is likely to be in the eyes of the beholder?

For these six reasons, I urge my colleagues to reject the proposed substitute.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

We are getting down to the end, and I think it is important to have all of the Members here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman from Michigan that before that would be in order the Chair would have to put the question on the pending matter before the Committee, since there has already been a quorum call in the Committee today.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. McHUGH).

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I think it is important, first of all, to stress once again what this Obey-Long substitute does not do. It would not require the withdrawal of American troops. It is not, therefore, a cut-and-run amendment. Indeed, the Obey-Long substitute would permit the President to maintain our troops in Lebanon. It recognizes the reality that we have some significant and serious interests in Lebanon, including an interest in promoting stability, an interest in promoting political accommodation, an interest in promoting a strengthening of the central government—all of the things that the proponents of the resolution have quite properly pointed out as American interests.

But this substitute resolution also recognizes the reality of the risks involved in our policy in Lebanon, and those risks, as everyone knows, include the military vulnerability of our marines in that situation. From a military point of view, their situation is untenable.

Second, and perhaps even more importantly, the substitute recognizes that if events do not go as hoped for, if stability is not promoted, if the factions in Lebanon cannot reach political accommodation, there is a significant risk that our military forces can be drawn into a war in Lebanon. In fact, our forces have already been used to defend not just our marines but the Lebanese Army itself.

Because there is a risk to the lives of our marines and because there is a risk of being drawn into a wider war, this substitute resolution reserves to both Congress and the President the responsibility, not just the right, but the responsibility to participate in the judgment as to whether those risks are justified as events unfold.

This is the significant difference between the Obey-Long substitute and the committee resolution. The committee resolution effectively turns over to the President that responsibility, and it may be politically convenient for some, but the fact is that we have a continuing responsibility.

My friend, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. JENKINS), earlier said that it is the President's job to formulate foreign policy. I respectfully disagree. It is the responsibility of the President and the Congress. After the policy is formulated it is the Chief Executive's job to implement that policy. What we are talking about in this case is a fundamental policy decision, not just one of policy implementation.

I therefore urge my colleagues to support the substitute.

Finally, I would like to address one point raised by the opposition with respect to a cease-fire situation. Let us assume that as we approach November 29 the Syrians decide to break the cease-fire. On November 29 the President would then have to report under the War Powers Act that hostilities exist. That would not require us to withdraw our troops, as some have suggested. It would simply require Congress to consider within 60 days whether it should authorize the continued presence of our troops under those conditions of hostilities.

Now, I am sure that if we find that the Syrians have broken the cease-fire for the purpose of getting our troops out, there would be strong sentiment here in Congress and throughout this country to maintain a troop presence in the face of Syrian pressure. I seriously doubt that we would withdraw because the Syrians decided that they were going to try to intimidate us by breaking a cease-fire.

So, please do not be misled. This Obey-Long substitute is not a prescription for withdrawing our troops; it is a prescription for reserving to the Congress and the President the joint responsibility of formulating policy, particularly when it relates to conditions of war and peace. I think that is our responsibility. I think that is what the people of our country expect of us.

Therefore, I urge the Members in the strongest terms to support the Obey-Long substitute.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS).

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Obey-Long amendment, and I urge my colleagues to do likewise.

As this debate draws to a close, with all of its fervor and emotion, let us be very clear about a few salient points.

First of all, let us understand how U.S. Marines came to be in Lebanon, to begin with.

As part of an arrangement last year to bring about the withdrawal of the PLO from Beirut, it was agreed that for a short period of time, 30 days, maybe 45, maybe 60 days, a multinational force would occupy certain territory to make certain that the withdrawing PLO fighters would not be descended upon either by the Israelis or the Lebanese Christian Phalangists and be slaughtered. And in that constructive, humanitarian way, we participated in that PLO program. But it was to be a temporary purpose. That temporary status no longer exists. Part of the agreement under which our marines came to Lebanon, spelled out in the exchange of letters which were signed on September 25 of last year, specifically provided that the Government of Lebanon would take all measures necessary to insure the protection of American Forces and that they would obtain assurances from all armed elements that they will refrain from hostilities and not interfere with the activities of the MNF.

Now, those assurances no longer exist. The short term no longer exists. So the question arises: What is the role of our marines there today? What is that role?

I support American leadership in the world and in the Middle East and the strong presence that we need to have and the strong affirmative and constructive policy that we need to follow. I support Secretary of State Shultz' three points of our policy: First, withdrawal of all foreign troops; second, establishing an independent, sovereign Lebanon; and third, protection of Israel's northern border. But nobody, even as recently as an hour ago, in this administration has told me what the Marine's present mission is. Who are they to shoot at? Who is the enemy? Next week if the Syrians attack the Lebanese Government forces, are we going to join in shooting at the Syrians? Or the Druze? Or the Shiites? What is the Marines' mission other than to be shot at and return fire?

It is for that reason that I cannot support an 18-month blank check of military involvement to this President or any President. That is why we need to either have a shorter period of time of authorized deployment or an opportunity under the Long-Obey amendment to let the President explain what the military role of the American fighting men is other than being shot at. Since their original purpose for being in Beirut no longer exists, someone—the President—must define their role. To ask a marine to place his life in jeopardy at least requires a reason.

If we need to be there with military force, then we should be, and this Congress, and I along with it, would support it. But if their role is simply to be cannon fodder to be shot at, then I do not think we can support that, in good conscience.

And those who say that this is a call for a withdrawal of forces, I say you are wrong and you know it. That is clearly not the case. It is a call to find out what our military forces are doing there. And without the Obey-Long amendment or without a much shorter authorization period than 18 months, there is no way to ascertain that. For that reason we shall adopt the Obey-Long substitute.

If we need diplomacy to bring peace to Lebanon, let us pursue it. If we need marines to play a role, let us spell out that role and do it. I will support them and the President. But, too much of what I have heard here today sounds like the Gulf of Tonkin debate which I re-read this morning.

This country and its people will support a cause and President but we need to know what it is and give no 18-month blank checks for war.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER).

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Obey-Long amendment and in support of the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, our consideration of this resolution marks a major turning point in our policy toward Lebanon. If there was a national consensus on the administration's present posture in Lebanon, and particularly on the role of our Marines there, we would not have this resolution before us today. We are engaged in this debate precisely because the administration has failed to articulate to the American people what its policies and intentions are toward Lebanon. Rather than easing the doubt of the American people about the purpose of our Marines' continuing presence in Lebanon, Secretary Shultz' testimony last week before our committee only served to raise further, troubling questions.

Just as the President has reservations about this resolution, so do I and a number of us in Congress. Our reservations revolve, I believe, around the same central issues. One is the type of military commitment in Lebanon we are authorizing in this resolution. Another involves the much broader constitutional question of the executive and legislative branches' respective authorities in committing our Armed Forces abroad. And another relates to the magical 18-month time-frame for the resolution. I wish to share with my colleagues my thoughts on these matters.

First, I am deeply disturbed by the resolution's exception which says that it: "shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to insure the safety of the Multinational Force in Lebanon." Secretary Shultz testified on September 21 that: "Those who seek to improve their position by force will probably not agree to a cease-fire until they run up against a stalemate on the battlefield." Although we now have an extremely fragile cease-fire, the phrase "protective measures" nevertheless appears to make this an open-ended authorization. Despite the President's remarks yesterday, we risk granting him an escape hatch to expand, as he sees fit, the scope or nature of our military involvement in Lebanon. This phrase could be the greenlight for the administration to increase the number of troops in Beirut, to authorize the Marines to undertake offensive ground action, or to launch retaliatory attacks.

In this connection, I wish to place in the RECORD an excerpt from the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters between the United States and Lebanese Governments: "the United States will deploy a force of approximately 1,200 personnel to Beirut * * *. In carrying out its mission, the American Force will not engage in combat. It may, however, exercise the right of self-defense." This definition of the number of troops that may be committed, and of the nature and scope of our Armed Forces' involvement must serve as the parameter for our military involvement in Lebanon. Should the President contemplate any change in the Marines' numbers or role in Lebanon, I expect that he will abide by his assurance yesterday that he will consult with the Congress prior to making a decision.

With respect to my second point, I believe it is important to understand exactly what we expect to occur at the end of the 18-month period. Secretary Shultz answered that question last week by saying: "that's an unknown factor." Chairman ZABLOCKI, on the other hand, stated during committee markup that upon the expiration of this resolution, the continuing presence of our Armed Forces in Beirut will depend upon the criteria set forth in section 5(b) of the war powers resolution. In short, Mr. Chairman, the resolution's ambiguity on this issue has thus far allowed both sides to claim victory. Eighteen months from now I fear we will be in exactly the same place we are today.

I voted in favor of House Joint Resolution 364 in committee primarily because the chairman assured us that it would signify for the first time the executive branch's acceptance of the war powers resolution, and that the committee would act prior to the end of the 18-month period if the Marines' mission in Lebanon should be enlarged in any way. Since that vote, I have been dismayed and disturbed by the administration's adamant refusal to define the exact nature of the Marines' mission in Lebanon or to acknowledge that the war powers resolution governs and will govern the Marines' presence there at the end of the 18-month period. I continue to believe that the situation clearly demands, as was Chairman ZABLOCKI's position when the Marines were first introduced 1 year ago, that the President report to Congress under section 4(a)(1) of war powers.

Mr. Chairman, Lebanon is once again facing an extremely delicate and difficult time. We in the United States must do all that we can to assist in bringing about a peaceful withdrawal of all foreign forces and in fostering negotiations toward a government of national unity. A unified Lebanon, in turn, will enhance the security of Israel. It is my hope that the multilateral initiative taken by the United States, United Kingdom, France, and Italy at the United Nations yesterday will prove fruitful. In view of the impact that our decision today will have not only on Lebanon, but on the region and on world opinion as well, our national interest would be best served at this time by acting in a bipartisan fashion and supporting the committee's resolution.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS).

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I voted against the rule under which we are debating this resolution for a variety of reasons. One of those reasons is the fact that the time would be controlled and limited. This precludes free and open debate on a matter of grave consequences. I find myself limited to a request to revise and extend my remarks. That notwithstanding these are my thoughts.

Mr. Chairman, 10 years ago, many of us sat in this body and debated the merits of the war powers resolution. That debate pitted liberal against liberal; conservative against conservative, hawk against hawk; dove against dove. Today I would like to address my liberal colleagues who voted for the war powers resolution then and who are probably going to vote for this resolution.

At that time I offered these comments on the resolution:

> I am convinced it will actually strengthen the position of future Presidents.
> I believe many Congressmen will live to see the mistake they made in allowing any President a free hand for 60 days to commit troops anywhere in the world for any reason, with the same opportunity to put pressure on Congress that we saw during the Indochina War.

Many of my colleagues felt that the war powers resolution would prevent U.S. involvement in future conflicts without the expressed consent of Congress and the American people. It has not.

Many felt it would cause the President to consult Congress more thoroughly when commiting troops overseas. It is clear this President and probably future Presidents will disregard the provisions of the war powers resolution when it suits their purposes.

Many argued that the war powers resolution would set up a creaky machinery of reports and consulations that would somehow save us from the kind of imprudence and timidity that this body displayed during the Indochina war. This resolution today proves that they were wrong.

The War Powers Act was supposed to force the Congress and American people to debate U.S. troop involvement in foreign countries; we are now about to abdicate that responsibility.

I hope my colleagues will look deeply into their hearts and see whether we have learned from the past.

In 1973 I argued that the war powers resolution was no real limitation on the power of the President to commit troops or begin hostilities. Rather it merely allows him 60 to 90 days to pressure Congress for approval.

We should not try to find a legal gimmick to do the job that can only be done by our own political courage, foresight, and resourcefulness.

The resolution we are debating today, will allow this Congress to once again sidestep its responsibility to debate the issue of stationing U.S. troops in Lebanon. Who are we at war with? Are we willing to have our young men die in a foreign country once again without knowing why we have sent them and what they are expected to do? Will we allow this war to escalate to a level of fighting that makes it impossible to rationally debate the situation or has this already happened?

General Kelly made more than a fraudian slip the other day when he referred to Lebanon by saying Vietnam. If we do not have the courage to stand up and debate the issue of U.S. troops in Lebanon now, openly, before the whole country, we will see our country becoming deeper and deeper involved in this conflict without knowing why.

The young men who fight our wars deserve more.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL).

Mr. FASCELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment, and in strong support of the resolution.

I ask this question: Where would we be in terms of what we are trying to accomplish in Lebanon either with the amendment or the resolution? Let us think about that for a minute.

The war powers resolution already exists—it is a fact. The Congress voted the war powers resolution 10 years ago. The war powers resolution is already the law, so do not tell me that by supporting the pending amendment as against the resolution that we will be doing something different because you are not fooling me and I do not think you are fooling anybody else.

Let us look at the other proposition, which is that the Congress should retain the right and the responsibility to enforce the provisions of the war powers resolution. The amendment, in my opinion, puts judgment day off once again. From the time of enactment of the law to this time we have not had a clear assertion by the Congress of the application of the law. We passed the Lebanon Supplementary Act. We gave the President the money to support the Marines in the multinational force, and set the limits and the guidelines by which he should do that. Now, do not tell me that we have not exercised our responsibilities with respect to the deployment of the Marines.

What do we do in the resolution? In the resolution, we say, "Mr. President, under our terms and conditions of the war powers resolution we hereby authorize you to keep the Marines in position for a period up to 18 months." But, at the same time, by applying terms and conditions of the war powers resolution to the current involvement of the Marines in hostilities in Lebanon, the Congress is invoking the resolution for the first time and the President has agreed to sign this measure.

On the other hand, the pending amendment does not immediately invoke the war powers resolution. It rather would set into motion a series of potential confrontations between the President and the Congress which could undermine the achievement of our foreign policy objectives in the Middle East.

I urge my colleagues to vote down the substitute and to support the resolution.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, to conclude debate on our side, I yield the balance of our time to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BOB MICHEL, the minority leader.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GEKAS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Obey-Long amendment.

Mr. Chairman, adoption of the Obey-Long substitute resolution would poison the world-acknowledged commitment of the United States to the stabilization of the nation of Lebanon. I will vote against it and support the main resolution, giving the fullest latitude for the preservation of the ceasefire and the continuation of negotiations for the establishment of a viable central government in Lebanon.

Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Long-Obey amendment, but also in opposition to the committee resolution. If so strict a constructionist as Thomas Jefferson did not feel constrained to seek a declaration of war against Tripoli, today's action constitutes an unwarranted intrusion on the foreign policy prerogatives of the Commander in Chief. Moreover, House Joint Resolution 364, in its statement of "Findings and Purpose," section 2(a.)(5) declares:

United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon are now in hostilities requiring authorization of their continued presence under the war powers resolution.

Hostilities historically have described conditions thus far unmet by the U.S. presence in Lebanon. The date of August 29, 1983, is invoked to demonstrate that hostilities have since that time prevailed with regard to our Marines.

If the deaths, however lamentable, of Lieutenant Losey and Sergeant Ortega on August 29 constitute hostilities, by conventional definition, then the same condition was reached in El Salvador with the recent murder of U.S. Navy Lieutenant Commander Schaufelberger. That same condition has also existed in South Korea since 1976 with the brutal murder of U.S. Army Captain Bonifas and Lieutenant Barrett at the hands of North Korean soldiers.

When I say there is no valid basis for invoking the War Powers Act at this time—and there is a cloud as to its constitutionality since the Supreme Court decision overturning congressional vetoes—it is not because I am making a brief for our continued presence in Lebanon.

Whatever reasons there may have been for introducing the multinational force to maintain stability, while foreign forces were withdrawing and the infant Lebanese Government restored authority over that beleaguered nation. Those reasons have long since passed.

Sad to say, there is no telling when or if the sovereignty of Lebanon will ever be restored. One thing, however, is certain: no externally imposed solutions can secure peace in that region.

President Gemayel and the Israeli Government, of necessity, must determine what is in their mutual interest and we can be assured that they will act accordingly.

We can be equally assured that if PLO strengths are rebuilt in Lebanon and threaten Israeli lives and security, the State of Israel will act with dispatch to remove that menace.

We can also rest assured that if the Syrian involvement in Lebanon becomes a threat to the State of Israel, the latter will dictate terms of a settlement in Damascus in a matter of hours or at most days.

We all hope and pray that reason might prevail to make such actions unnecessary. But that determination is not ours to make. Rather, it must—and will—be made by those who are directly affected.

In the meantime, it is a legitimate exercise of the powers of our Commander in Chief to move U.S. forces to trouble spots throughout the world that advance overall U.S. interests, short of committing them to the waging of war without congressional approval.

The intent of the War Powers Act is admirable. After two undeclared wars within the past 33 years, fought without intention of winning, in part because of the absence of such a declaration, Congress sought to reclaim the constitutional responsibility it relinquished in 1950.

But this should not cause the Congress to go overboard and interfere with the legitimate exercise of Executive authority conferred upon the President as Commander in Chief.

If U.S. forces suddenly find themselves truly involved in hostilities, I am sure the President will make the decision to withdraw our forces, or will seek a declaration of war. That is the time to invoke the concept of the War Powers Act. That is the time each one of us in this body will have not just the right, but the constitutional duty to determine the wisdom of such a policy decision.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, conceding at the very outset that this amendment is probably going to produce the most criss-crossed, mixed-up bag of voting patterns of any resolution all year long, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard some supporters of this amendment state that they do not want to get Marines out of Lebanon immediately. They reject any move to get us out as soon as possible.

I am glad this is the case.

But the amendment before us, while it does not specifically call for immediate withdrawal right now does provide a framework in which every 30 days the President of the United States would be hostage to the whims and the designs of hostile elements in Lebanon.

They could put pressure on negotiators simply by breaking the cease-fire whenever it suited their purposes.

This is foreign policy on the installment plan. Miss one payment and you lose everything you have been working for.

If I were a Syrian sitting on the high ground overlooking Beirut, looking down the barrel of my gun at U.S. Marines, I cannot think of anything I would rather have than the assurance given to me by the U.S. Congress—that I could control American options every 30 days simply by what I do or do not do.

This is no "middle ground" as its adherents claim. It is instead a muddled ground upon which the President of the United States of America cannot conduct foreign policy with the flexibility and freedom he obviously needs.

No, this amendment does not help things. It simply adds new complications to an already complicated situation.

When the Congress and the President act in a spirit of bipartisanship and present a united face to the world as the resolution does, we can work wonders in foreign affairs.

The very fact that Speaker O'Neill joined with the President, sent a clear message to the Syrians that they just cannot sit and wait for victory. And I might say parenthetically, moving up the New Jersey within the last few days and weeks did not do any harm either.

The Speaker has acted in the national interest and I just want to praise him for some good old-fashioned, unapologetic patriotism.

I rise in opposition to the pending amendment. But at the heart of the matter is the resolution itself.

Let us first deal with the most obvious fact, the resolution is a compromise. Most of us see something wrong with it but nobody has come up with a better solution. Thirty-day deadlines are no substitute for sound leadership and firm commitment.

We are not alone in Lebanon. The French, the Italians, and the British are also there. This is not a case of unilateral American intervention.

We are not there as self-appointed "gendarmes" of the world, but as voluntary partners of a Western alliance. Members of the multinational force have mutually beneficial interests and are willing to share the risks involved.

The fact that the West stood together in Lebanon made a significant contribution to the current cease-fire. That just had to be a condition precedent to sitting down and talking around the conference table.

I recall when I was a freshman Congressman way back in 1958, President Eisenhower sent 14,000 American troops to Lebanon, along with 70 ships of the 6th Fleet. That was a massive show of force, and accomplished our national objective. Now, we probably cannot do that kind of thing politically these days because of what has happened.

Realistically, we know that the circumstance in Lebanon today is radically different. The United States itself has gone through the dark valley of Vietnam. We have emerged from that valley with doubts about our capacity to use our power without getting involved in wars we cannot or will not win.

Those doubts have been mentioned over and over again on the floor during this debate.

I believe the time has come to get back to judging foreign affairs on the facts of each individual case and not on the Vietnam analogy. Whether Marines stay in Lebanon, and how long they stay are relevant questions. But we must answer them on the facts—not on our fears of the past.

We do not know if the present cease-fire will last, but we have to hold out the hope that it will.

A government of national reconciliation in Lebanon can bring peace and freedom to the Lebanese people. The cease-fire only sets the stage for such a government. What we do today in agreeing to this resolution is to reemphasize our commitment to peace in Lebanon.

If our combined efforts fail in this regard, a Syrian-backed anti-American government in Lebanon would transform the entire Middle East. It would tell the world that commitments made by the United States are not worth taking very seriously.

If Syria gets what it wants, the Soviet Union will have backed a winner in the Middle East for the first time. They will surely attempt to take advantage of it.

A few weeks ago I met in my office with a group of distinguished Maronite Christian clergymen of Lebanese-American background.

They expressed to me the thanks of the Lebanese people for what our Marines have done. These visitors made quite an impression on me with their informed views and their sincerity.

This resolution is not perfect. But no other option I am aware of, addresses the situation as frankly as this one, and none provides a better mixture of caution and commitment.

The Obey-Long substitute has good intentions—but it also has an unexamined promise, which is the idea that legitimate congressional responsibilities for foreign affairs demand "hands-on" power by the Congress.

We all want peace in Lebanon. We all want our marines out of Lebanon. We all want a free and independent Lebanon.

But the Obey-Long amendment cannot accomplish all of these things. It can only serve to handicap our President to conduct sensitive and fast-moving foreign policy.

I would urge a vote against this amendment, and a vote for the resolution which the Speaker and President have joined together in formulating.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG).

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY).

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust that everyone understands, regardless of their position on this resolution, that this is a debate among friends, and it is a debate among Members, who on both sides care about the national interest, and care deeply.

I want to make clear again that the timetable on our substitute is not 30 days or 60 days, as has been suggested by previous speakers. The timetable says that by November 30, the President must report, as he is required to do under the law. It says if the President does report, if he does comply with the law, then under the existing processes of law he has an additional 60 days to persuade the Congress that we ought to stay in Lebanon further. Even if he fails that—and I doubt that he would, I suppose—even if he fails that, he would still then have another 30 days in which to withdraw the troops. So there is no 30-day limit or there is no 60-day limit; there is a much longer limit than that, even if the President does not obey the law, and if he obeys it, he has two options: He can either follow the practices under the War Powers Act or he can gain additional extensions so long as a cease-fire holds. And I think we want to keep our options open on that. That means that under our provision he has a longer timeframe than the existing law, the War Powers Act.

Some speakers have said that the cease-fire shows that the process is working. If so, then our substitute is benign. If it is not so, then our substitute is needed to retain our options.

I believe troops are going to be needed in the Middle East someday as part of an overall Middle East settlement to help as part of a multinational force to enforce the peace, if we ever do get one on the part of all parties, not just Lebanon.

I would hate to see us throw away that ability to provide that assistance at that time by an effort today to try to keep our troops in Lebanon in violation of law. Underline those last four words, "in violation of law," because this country would not accept it in the long term, and we would lose the ability, and we would lose the flexibility that we would need in the future.

I want to make one other point. We have had people who say that if the cease-fire breaks, we have to bring the troops home. That is not true. If the cease-fire breaks, that simply triggers the War Powers Act, as does existing law, and if you do not like that fact, then you have an obligation to stand here today and not pretend that you are trying to preserve the War Powers Act. You have an obligation then to admit that you do not like the terms of the present law, and you can amend the present law, but do not blame us for something that is in the present law.

We have been asked what our foreign policy objectives are in this amendment. Those objectives are three. Those objectives are to support the law at home, to keep the pressure on the Lebanese Government, to broaden its space, as well as keeping pressure on Syria, and to keep our options open in case the cease-fire which is now holding unravels.

If you are sure beyond the shadow of a doubt that you want troops in Lebanon for 18 months, vote no. If you are not sure, if you want to be able to make decisions on the basis of facts, at some time in the future, and defend the law at the same time, vote yes.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 4 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, a major aspect of this whole problem is constitutional, of course. Let me quote Supreme Court Justice Douglas:

> It has become popular to think that the President has power to initiate war on his own authority. There is not a word in the Constitution that grants that power. It runs only to Congress.
> (The framers) knew what emergencies were, knew the pressures they engender for authoritative action, knew, too, how they afford a ready pretext for usurpation. We may also suspect that they suspected that emergency powers would tend to kindle emergencies. Aside from the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in times of rebellion or invasion when the public safety may require it, they made no express provision for exercise of extraordinary authority because of a crisis. I do not think we rightfully may so amend their work, and if we could, I am not convinced it would be wise to do so . . .

Justice Douglas continued: "If either branch contains more informed and experienced members, it is probably the Congress . . ." rather "than the more transient presidents and their advisers."

And we know how transient some of them are.

The primary reason for invoking the War Powers Act is constitutional. With nuclear war being destructive beyond imagination, all the doubts should be resolved in favor of not rushing into a peripheral war situation without full debate and the backing of the American people. Certainly a war in far-off Lebanon gives us that time for debate.

Actually, we know that Andrew Jackson came to Congress and asked for a declaration of war when we went to war against the pirates. When we were attacked by the Japanese at Pearl Harbor, President Roosevelt got Congress to declare war that very day. Now they say, "Well, times have changed. Things happen so fast we can't get to Congress on time."

Let me say something about the days in which the Constitution was passed. At just about that same time they had the same transportation problems they did at the time when Calhoun somewhat later had to go down to South Carolina to deal with the South Carolina Legislature. He could not get the boat because the Potomac was frozen over. He got a stagecoach, a relay coach, that rode for 9 solid days with relays, and he had to sit on the top because he could not get any room inside. It ruined his health, but he got there in time. Those were the days in which Presidents went to Congress and recognized that Congress had to declare war.

On every single war we got into, up until the Korean war, Congress declared war. There was not one single case when Congress did not declare war. The first time was when Truman went into the Korean war without asking for Congress to declare war—the very first time.

So I say that we have time. The framers of our Constitution gave us a great document. Obviously, it takes courage to use it. That is what the Obey-Long resolution calls for.

Let us have the guts to stand up and use the great Constitution our forefathers gave us.

That is the highest constitutional ground on which I want to speak. Now let me get to a lower political level.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Members, do you want to go back and tell your people next election that you voted to keep Marines as sitting-duck targets in a low-level area in Lebanon for 18 solids months? Do you want to go back and tell your people that? If you do, vote for the committee bill. If you do not, vote for the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) and myself which sets no particular time and which leaves it up to the Congress entirely. It would have to come back to Congress. It would put the President on a short leash. Let him come back to Congress and find out what we think every time there is a real emergency.

We have had one and a half ceasefires a month in the last 10 years in Lebanon. We know what has happened in the last 30 days.

Mr. Chairman, Congress has the right to be informed by the President and be consulted on what is happening. I ask the Members to vote for the Long-Obey resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) has consumed 4 minutes, and the gentleman still has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, we yield back the 1 minute that is remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining time on our side to our majority leader, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT).

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, as everyone knows, I have high respect, great regard, and considerable personal affection for the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. OBEY) and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG). Under no circumstances would I question their motives. Never would I impugn their patriotism. I believe what they are attempting to do proceeds from the finest of intentions.

However, I must rise to oppose the Obey-Long substitute and to ask for your support of the committee resolution. I oppose the Obey-Long substitute, and I think all of us, if we examine it carefully, must be constrained to do so on two fundamental bases: First, because it creates an unnecessary constitutional crisis at the very time when we need to resolve the constitutional differences in a decisive way. It creates the image and the message of indecision and division within our country at the very time when we need to present to the world a message of unity.

The second reason is that it would create the condition under which the Syrians or the Libyans or some other surrogate of the Soviet Union could determine the time and terms of the withdrawal of American forces from Lebanon. Please consider just how this substitute could produce that unintended effect.

Section 2 reads:

> After the end of the 90 day period beginning on August 29 . . . no funds appropriated by the Congress may be obligated or expended for peacekeeping activities in Lebanon . . . unless . . . the President has submitted to the Congress either the report required by section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution or . . . certified . . . that a cease fire is in effect and being observed by all parties.

In the first place, I think it unlikely that the President would sign this in the event it should pass both Houses. Most likely it would be vetoed, in which case we would end up with no controls whatever, no limits over the President's power to utilize troops.

If by some stretch of the imagination he were to sign this document, does anyone really believe that the President of the United States is going to submit a report under section 4(a)(1)? He has had that opportunity. He has not exercised it.

Do we want to create a constitutional crisis or do we want to assert, as is our prerogative under the war powers resolution, that on August 29 when our forces came under fire the war powers resolution became operative?

It is not up to us to give the President another 90 days in which to quarrel and quibble about it. I think it is up to us rather to do what we do wisely in this resolution as it comes from the committee, and that is to assert the powers of the Congress to place limitations upon the size, the role and the duration of American forces in Lebanon.

If we fail to pass this committee resolution, we shall have failed in our opportunity to do just that.

The second thing is that by permitting some trouble making intransigent who does not wish us well nor wish well the peace process in the Middle East the opportunity to break a ceasefire every 30 days, the substitute provisions could entirely disrupt the Congress of the United States. It could require us to come back at 30-day intervals to renew the right of the marines to stay or to demand their withdrawal; or it could provoke another crisis between the Congress and the President as to whether or not the truce were being observed. Surely we do not want that continued scenario of indecision.

Now, I ask you simply to bear in mind that this resolution as it comes to us from our committee is a strong resolution. It is the result of insistence by our Speaker and by the minority leader of our House and by the majority leader of the other body on two irreducible minimums, that the powers of the Congress must be protected and that the integrity of the war powers resolution must be preserved.

On no fewer than 10 specific places the committee resolution makes direct and unambiguous reference to the war powers resolution.

In the second section, Congress determines that the requirements of 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution became operative on August 29, 1983.

In the very next subsection, Congress provides that the authorities granted are granted under that war powers resolution.

It sets limits on time, scope and duration and preserves without modification or amendment the Lebanon Emergency Act and the war powers resolution.

For those reasons, I think the course of wisdom and responsibility is to reject this substitute and to support the committee resolution.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

Mr. RIDGE and Mr. VANDERGRIFF changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri and Mr. DOWDY of Mississippi changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. ZABLOCKI

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I offer amendments en bloc.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. ZABLOCKI: Page 4, line 9, strike out "six months" and insert in lieu thereof "sixty days".

Page 4, after line 19, insert the following new paragraph (3) and redesignate existing paragraphs (3), (4), and (5) as paragraphs (4), (5), and (6), respectively:

(3) the contributions of each participating country to the achievement of the objectives of the Multinational Force in Lebanon, and any other aid each such country has provided to Lebanon;

Page 4, line 25, strike out "and"; page 5, line 2, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a semicolon; and after line 2, insert the following:

(7) the progress made during the reporting period in the training of the Lebanese Armed Forces, with an assessment concerning when this national force will be capable of maintaining internal security in Lebanon;

(8) the level of fighting that has occurred during the reporting period and, if a ceasefire is in effect at the time of the report, the prospects for the continuation of this ceasefire;

(9) the estimated additional cost to the United States during the reporting period of participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(10) the number of United States military casualties during the reporting period as a result of participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon; and

(11) the progress made during the reporting period in negotiations designed to lead to a political settlement in Lebanon.

(d) The Congress is opposed to any partition of Lebanon and the annexation of its territory by any foreign country.

Mr. ZABLOCKI (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and a Member opposed to the amendment will be recognized for 30 minutes.

Is there any Member in the Chamber who opposes the amendment?

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Chairman, with the failure to approve the Long amendment, I intend to vote against passage of House Joint Resolution 364, legislation to authorize an 18-month extension for the participation of U.S. Armed Forces in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon. I did so because of the administration's refusal to obey the law and recognize its responsibilities and the authority of the Congress under the 1973 War Powers Act.

The essence of the War Powers Act is a statutory reminder that the constitutional power to commit troops to combat is a power that is shared between the President and Congress. While the Constitution is precise in empowering only the Congress the right to declare war, the War Powers Act recognizes that in our modern era there are situations where U.S. forces may be thrust into hostilities that do not entail a state of war. In these situations, the shared responsibilities of the President and the Congress is clear. The most important duty entrusted to the President under the act is to faithfully consult the Congress as to the mission of the committed troops, and the mission of the policy they are entrusted to defend, sometimes with their lives.

The President has failed to set out, to any satisfactory degree, the mission or long-range goals of U.S. troops in Lebanon. There is nothing in the legislation approved today that will insure that the President will tell the American people, through the Congress, what the mission of our troops is in Lebanon. The President, directly and through Secretary of State George Shultz, has already said that the administration's actions in Lebanon will not be bound by the War Powers Act or by any other legislation approved by Congress. To me this simply means that the President does not believe that he required congressional authorization before committing additional troops to Lebanon or substantially changing their role, despite clear authority in the War Powers Act for the Congress to approve or disapprove such actions.

I cannot support the enactment of the present legislation before the Congress to commit U.S. troops to Lebanon for an additional 18 months when the administration fails to comply with the most simplistic requirement of the War Powers Act to clearly set out our mission there.

More importantly, I am disturbed over the administration's refusal to recognize the responsibility of the Congress, under the War Powers Act, to ultimately determine the course of our action in Lebanon. The priority of the Congress must be to insure that our Nation is not again pulled into a quagmire like Vietnam by failing to exercise its responsiblity under the warmaking provisions of the Constitution. The actions of the administration, and the present legislation before the Congress, fail to insure that our Lebanon policies will be controlled according to the desires of the American people and their representatives in the Congress.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am offering incorporates the suggestion of a number of Members which felt that certain provisions in House Joint Resolution 364 needed to be reinforced. These amendments will not change in any fundamental way the basic composition of the bipartisan compromise that has been reached between the President and the Congress.

The first element of the amendment changes the 6-month reporting requirement in section 4 to a 60-day reporting requirement. This will enable Congress and the Committee on Foreign Affairs to continually assess the viability of U.S. participation in the multinational force and whether U.S. foreign policy objectives served by the Marine presence are being achieved.

The second element of the amendment is incorporated at the suggestion of the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON). It adds several provisions to the reporting requirement in section 4 of the resolution. The President, in addition to the current reporting requirements in section 4, would be required to report on the progress in training the Lebanese armed forces, the level of fighting that has occurred during the reporting period and the prospects for continuation of a cease-fire if one is in effect, the estimated U.S. cost and number of U.S. military casualties in Lebanon, and the prospects for negotiations leading to a political settlement.

The final element of the amendment restates current U.S. policy and expresses the congressional view that the Congress is opposed to any partition of Lebanon and the annexation of its territory by any foreign country. This part of the amendment incorporates the suggestions of the gentlelady from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR).

The amendment reinforces the responsible congressional controls already in House Joint Resolution 364 and I urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama for purposes of debate only.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me just say, if I understand the amendment, and I have read it, this is in substance almost identical to the amendment we sought to offer yesterday from the Armed Services Committee.

As the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs knows, a group from the Armed Services Committee did visit Lebanon over the weekend. We spoke with most of the principals on the Lebanese side who are involved. What we proposed to do and asked for permission to do in the Committee on Rules is approximately what the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs is seeking to do now.

We felt that 6 months was entirely too long with as fast moving as events are, with as volatile as the situation is; 6 months would be meaningless.

We had asked that it be limited to at least 60 days with more frequent reports as events would indicate and to define certain areas, such as casualties, such as costs, such as progress being made in the cease-fire, all of which are included here.

I think it makes sense and I would certainly support the gentleman and congratulate him for offering the amendment.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chariman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD).

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 364, which provides for the procedure under which U.S. marines would remain a part of the peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

During this debate, many have argued that keeping our marines in Lebanon would be a tragic mistake. It has been argued that this resolution is tantamount to a Gulf of Tonkin resolution. I would argue that the greatest mistake we could make would be to disapprove this resolution or amend it so as to weaken our commitment to our allies and our friends in Lebanon. And the issue today is really not whether the President should or should not have invoked the War Powers Act in the first place. It is whether a majority of the people in this House believe our commitment to Lebanon, via the peacekeeping force, should continue or not.

As much as we might like it to be otherwise, this Nation cannot retreat into an isolationist shell whenever events become unpleasant. To do so may very well allow us to forget unpleasant memories, but it would do absolutely nothing for our national interest or our credibility.

How this Nation responds in Labanon is bound to be viewed by friendly and hostile governments alike as a test of this Nation's credibility as a world power. To fail that test would have repercussions far beyond the borders of Lebanon. Why should anyone henceforth take American military power seriously if we abandon our commitments at the first sign of trouble? And how would the other nations of the multinational force—who have also suffered casualties—react? These are matters not to be taken lightly.

But there is another, more important, reason for continuing our presence in the region—the American national interest is at stake in the survival of Lebanon. The power vacuum which would be created by the removal of the multinational force would enhance to an extreme degree the opportunity for Syria to achieve its long/standing goals in Lebanon. It would enhance the possibility of an uncontrollable civil war which would surpass the violence Lebanon has already experienced. The undermining of the Lebanese Government which would result from the withdrawal of the multinational force would further destabilize an already unstable region.

I urge my colleagues to approve the resolution. It responsibly recognizes the interests of both the President and the Congress. It sends a clear signal to the rest of the world that the United States plans to abide by its commitments.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to indicate the strong support that we have for the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maryland (Mrs. BYRON).

Mrs. BYRON. I thank the chairman for yielding.

I, too, had the opportunity to join with nine of my colleagues this weekend and spent a very intent 48 hours in Lebanon. It was interesting to me because I had an opportunity in July over the 4th and 5th to spend 48 hours in Lebanon and the comparison was quite dramatic.

I rise very much in support of this amendment. I think it is one that is necessary. We have seen an escalation of the number of troops on the ground; originally 800, then 1,200, now 1,600. We also have 100 Army individuals in Lebanon.

I think the fact that this Congress should have a 60-day report is a very important issue and I concur with the chairman in support of this amendment.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support this amendment. I am also going to support the resolution reluctantly. But I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs: This resolution would prohibit substantial expansion of our Armed Forces in Lebanon unless there is statutory authorization from the Congress. Yet I note that yesterday we were told that the numbers have been increased from 1,200 to 1,600 without any statutory authorization even though when the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, which imposed that limitation, was passed, the manager, Mr. HAMILTON, said:

> The addition of several hundred troops beyond the 1,200 would constitute a substantial expansion for purposes of this provision.

So I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs just what would be a substantial expansion for purposes of this resolution.

I think we are entitled to know since evidently the President does not consider that the intent of the act which imposed that restriction is binding on him.

My colleagues, this is a very serious matter. We are about to vote on a limitation against any substantial expansion without statutory approval when obviously the President must consider that an expansion of 33 percent is not a substantial expansion, since just such an expansion was disclosed yesterday.

I wonder if the gentleman from Wisconsin can tell us what is the intent of this resolution in that respect.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Does the gentleman refer to what constitutes a substantial increase for purposes of section 7?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Yes.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Normally it would be several hundred, and it is my understanding that the substantial increase would be another unit introduced into the area.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Well, if he adds another 400, is that substantial?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. He has to come to Congress for additional authority.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I did not hear the chairman.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. The President would have to come to Congress for additional authority.

Mr. SEIBERLING. So if he adds another 400, that would be a substantial expansion which would require additional authority.

I think that is very important.

Mr. Chairman, I voted against the rule on this resolution, because I thought we should be free to offer more amendments. Unfortunately, the rule passed. I then voted for the Long-Obey amendment as the best option we were given. It lost. I now urge my colleagues to support this resolution, not as the best solution, but the only opportunity we now have to put any controls on the President with respect to future expansion of our military commitments in Lebanon.

By voting for this resolution, we also eliminate any excuse the administration might otherwise have if it fails to bring about a settlement in Lebanon. Any such settlement must be built around a government that fairly represents all the religious groups in Lebanon. If it appears that the Gemayel government is unable to construct such a government within a reasonable time, then the multinational force, including the American contingent, should be withdrawn.

In the meantime, efforts should be made to increase the already sizable contingents of our European allies, who already constitute over two-thirds of the MNF. Every effort should also be made to bring the United Nations in as the primary guarantor of the cease-fire.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HARRISON).

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I will support the resolution now before the house, which invokes the provisions of the War Powers Act and authorizes the continued presence of U.S. troops in Lebanon for a period of up to 18 months. I will support this resolution for three reasons.

First, because our troops are there pursuant to an agreement entered into with the Government of Lebanon on September 25, 1982, when U.S. marines became part of the multinational peacekeeping force. The multinational force continues to have a viable role. Indeed, the cease-fire, which holds today even as we speak, exists in large part because there is a multinational force. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that we must allow our troops to remain as part of it in order to keep faith with the people of the region, the imperiled Government of Lebanon and with our colleagues in the multinational force.

Second, because if we are to maintain our troops in the field, it would be a breach of faith with them and a failure of our responsibility as a government not to allow those troops to defend themselves and to take such measures as may be necessary for their own protection.

Third, because if our troops are authorized to remain, it is necessary that they be given a mandate of reasonable length. Otherwise, we would encourage the Syrians and their surrogates to refuse to negotiate since, from their perspective, all they would have to do is maintain a stalemate in the knowledge that our troops are shortly going away.

At the same time I think it is imperative that we understand what this resolution does not do.

First, it does not endorse the decision to send the marines into Lebanon in the first place. I believe that decision was a mistake. But it was made. The troops are there. This resolution attempts to deal responsibly with that fact. To avoid a similar situation in the future, I strongly urge the composition of multinational peacekeeping missions be restricted to forces of small, generally nonalined nations. Such nations are less likely to be drawn into an international confrontation and, if they are, the results of such a confrontation would have less potentially disastrous consequences for the peace of the world.

Second, it does not recognize the President's right to make unilateral use of American military forces in combat siutations. Rather, it is the result of a process of negotiation between the President and the leadership of the Congress which recognizes the legitimate congressional role in the decision to employ American forces and specifically invokes the authority of the War Powers Act.

Third, and most important, this resolution does not approve any greater number of troops or any wider range of activity for the American forces in Lebanon. If it did, I would vote against it. Like many of my colleagues, I was gravely troubled by the remarks of the Secretary of State before the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Had the Secretary's views remained the position of this administration, it would have been impossible for me to support this resolution. However, I believe the assurances given by the President yesterday "to seek congressional authorization * * * if circumstances require any substantial expansion in the number or role" of U.S. troops in Lebanon.

This resolution is the result of a compromise, Mr. Chairman, and, by definition, it is not what any one of us would have written had we been left to the task ourselves. But it strikes a fragile balance in a very critical situation and at a very difficult time. While there may be no direct connection, none of us can deny that the shadow of Korean airliner 007 has fallen across this resolution as it has across the world. This is not a time in which the United States can be perceived as abdicating its responsibilities or as unwilling to enforce its commitments to the international community.

Today, Mr. Chairman, we authorize American peacekeeping participation in a military conflict in the oldest and holiest part of the world. We do so, I know, reluctantly. But we do so because we simply do not have any alternative. As we do, may we pray that the God of us all—of Muslim, Christian, and Jew—will look mercifully upon our decision and guide us upon the path to that true peace on Earth for which all men of good will continue to strive.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. JONES).

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I rise in reluctant support of this joint resolution. I find it very difficult to vote to keep American military forces in a situation that could result in the further shedding of American blood. On the other hand, I also find it difficult to vote in such a way that hinders the President's ability to carry out his responsibility as this Nation's chief foreign policy spokesman, especially in light of the bipartisan effort undertaken to put together this delicately balanced resolution.

This resolution has been described in this Chamber as an 18-month blank check for the President. I would hope that the administration would not view it as such. I would hope that this 18-month period would be used to achieve the goal of the removal of all foreign military forces from Lebanese soil, a goal without which the passage of this resolution will be a fruitless exercise.

Consequently, after much discussion and careful thought, I have come to the conclusion that our own best interest and those of the Lebanese people may be best served by the approval of this resolution. I hope that the administration will use this authority wisely and prudently and continue vigorous pursuit of the removal of outside military forces in Lebanon. I further hope that this course will result in the Lebanese being allowed to solve the problems of Lebanon.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR).

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the chairman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend him for offering this amendment. It is an amendment that I proposed to the Rules Committee. I hope everybody knows what it is. It is an important amendment. It puts us on record as being opposed to partitioning Lebanon.

I would like to have you remember that 10 years ago Lebanon was the pearl of the Mediterranean. We think it can still be that, providing our country exerts a morale force in the Middle East. We must not continue to pour more and more arms to that region and expect then to propose peace.

I want to say a word to the Lebanese people themselves: You know, this is the year that we celebrate the 100th anniversary of Khalil Gibran, the very fine Lebanese poet. He wrote a beautiful poem concerning Lebanon many years ago. It can still apply today. He talked about the Lebanon that he wanted, which was the Lebanon of beauty and truth and the Lebanon that some people were dividing.

I hope that the people of Lebanon will put down their arms and engage in dialog. The people must unite and relate to each other irrespective of their religious or philosophical difference. The Lebanese people must take responsibility for their actions against each other. Only if they live together in peace and harmony can the dream of its greatest poet Khalil Gibran be fulfilled.

This is very, very important. Despite all the exploitation of that country by outside forces, it is very important that the people themselves realize that they have to forget some of the past and unite for a better Lebanon and make it once again what it once was, the "Pearl of the Mediterranean."

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BILIRAKIS).

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Chairman, as we debate this resolution before us today, which authorizes continued participation of U.S. marines in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon; we hear a good many references to our involvement in Vietnam. This has been the case with many of the foreign policy issues which the Congress has considered recently, including our goals and policies in Central America.

It seems that any decision to commit U.S. troops, advisers, or even nonpersonnel military assistance to our national security and foreign policy objectives around the globe is haunted by the specter of our Vietnam experience. Almost without exception, the critics of these commitments compare U.S. involvement in Lebanon or El Salvador to out involvement in Vietnam and express not just the fear but the conviction that our present actions will lead us down the same path that we have walked in the past. It is a fear that is very real for all of us, including those who have supported many of the President's foreign policy initiatives.

While Americans should never forget the lessons of the past, neither should we allow our Vietnam experience to paralyze us to the point where we are incapable of making decisions on which our present and our future depend. If Vietnam was truly a lesson for us, then we should learn from it. I am afraid, however, that it has become not so much a lesson as an excuse for refusing to make the difficult commitments that our foreign policy and national security objectives often require.

Comparisons of Lebanon with Vietnam may be emotionally effective, but they are not factually sound. The U.S. marines in Lebanon are part of a multinational peacekeeping force. British, French, and Italian forces are serving alongside our marines. The mission of this force clearly is to help keep the peace while the Lebanese Government goes about the business of removing all foreign troops from Lebanese soil and of undertaking the difficult task of establishing a stable, sovereign state. It is a peaceful mission but, yes, it is also a dangerous one for the men who comprise the force.

The United States has a legitimate interest in fostering a peaceful resolution of the Lebanese crisis for many reasons, not least among them our commitments to our own security, to world peace, and to a more democratic future for all people. The multinational character of the peacekeeping force is evidence that many other nations share an interest in this region and have also made a commitment. Yes, this is a world issue, but let there be no mistake that we are part of that world and that what happens in other nations on other continents does affect us.

We must be able to make and to keep our commitments, even the difficult ones, when they are in our own best interests, the interests of our allies, and the interest of that better world to which our great Nation has always been committed. Our participation in the peacekeeping force in Lebanon is one such commitment and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. RAHALL).

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment pending.

Mr. Chairman, I am greatly encouraged by the vote that was just taken by the full House of Representatives and I see in the final resolution that is now pending before this body an effort to further enhance the basis that is being built in Lebanon for national unity.

The current administration of President Gemayel in Beirut is beginning to reach out and include all of the various militias within his Cabinet and within his government. It, of course, is impossible to include every political faction within the various religions that exist in the country of Lebanon, but those efforts are finally being made now and being made on a very successful basis.

I think the presence of our marines there is important in furthering that national unity and will bring about the day when all foreign forces can be expelled from that country and when, indeed, we can see a united Lebanon that can control its own destiny. And that is our purpose in being there.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. KAZEN).

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that what we are about to do here today, and I rise in support of this resolution, is to send a message to the Middle East that we are very serious about trying to unify the country of Lebanon.

It should be a message to the people of Lebanon to lay down their arms and start talking over the negotiating table and unite that country that at one time was unified, where all people's rights were respected where there was absolutely no distinction between any of the religious factions in that democratic process. And, at the same time, we are sending a message to the Syrians and all other foreign forces that are in Lebanon, that their presence will not be tolerated and that the American presence in Lebanon assures them that the American people are solidly behind Lebanon wishing it to again become the wonderful pro-Western democracy which it has a history of being.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. O'NEILL), to close debate.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I believe it was on September 3 when I received a call from the White House asking me to fly back to Washington to meet with the leadership on both sides of the aisle and with the administration.

We talked that day about the Korean matter and we talked about the Lebanon matter.

It was the first opportunity that I had ever had to meet with Ambassador MacFarlane. I must say he impressed me. He told about the diplomatic approach that he was making over there. He was working for a cease-fire, that he trusted that there would be a new Cabinet, broad in scope, that it may include all the factions in Lebanon. And we were hoping for a withdrawal of all forces and that Israel had already committed to a pledge that they would withdraw.

I have seen along the line what has happened. First of all, the cease-fire is in place, the Cabinet has resigned and they are going to have a new Cabinet. And I trust and hope in faith that that new Cabinet will think of human rights and think of the people of all of the various denominations, religious and otherwise.

And there is one thing left and it is the matter of the withdrawal of foreign forces.

I support the amendment as offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. I rise in support of this resolution because I believe, first, that withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon and the establishment of a free sovereign independent Lebanon is a very real possibility.

Second, I believe that the presence of the multinational force in Beirut promotes peace in the area and helps the process of national reconstruction of Lebanon.

I believe that under the War Powers Act—and I truly believe this—that the 90-day limitation on the presence of the U.S. marines in Lebanon began to run on August 31, 2 days after our forces were involved in hostilities.

The law is clear to me that a report should have been submitted on that day and therefore, if Congress does not take action by joint resolution to authorize the continued presence of the U.S. marines, they would have to be withdrawn.

I have put serious effort and thought into these remarks that I am making today. I believe that as a result of the current cease-fire and the resignation of the Cabinet in Lebanon, the government in Beirut will make every effort to show it will serve and represent the interests and the rights of all of the people in Lebanon.

I believe this resolution clearly limits the scope and the role of the U.S. forces in Lebanon so that the danger of a Vietnam-type escalation is avoided.

This resolution, believe me, is not a blank check as some have asserted.

On the contrary, it establishes unprecedented restraints on the deployment and mission of the U.S. Armed Forces overseas. While guarding against a rapid escalation of United States involvement in hostilities in Lebanon, it still sends a strong message to Syria that the United States is serious about securing the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

Now I am aware of the deep concern in this House regarding the length of times involved in this authorization. When the President was speaking to us on that particular day and I have reference to the fact that from the House there was only JIM WRIGHT and myself and BOB MICHEL on the other side, they asked and wanted an open ended resolution of support.

No way were we going to give an open end. No way, I said, Mr. President. And I used the words "no way." No way are you or anybody else ever going to have another Tonkin Gulf Resolution.

So we are the ones who came up, after consideration of our Committee on Foreign Affairs and our leaders and their staff, working with the White House, on the 18 months. It was a hard decision to make, but I thought it was the best one.

I believe sincerely that the diplomatic efforts currently underway will not only promote reconciliation and stability in Lebanon, but I believe in my heart that it is going to mean an early departure of our marines. I really truly believe that. And that is why I have supported this. I believe the President of the United States when he says to me head to head he has no plans to change the peacekeeping role of the marines. I believe that the Commander in Chief's first concern is for the safety of the fighting men in Lebanon. And I believe the President is expending every possible effort to see that the differences in Lebanon are settled through negotiations rather than through a force of arms.

Furthermore, if we accept this resolution, I would trust, and I assure my colleagues that I will personally monitor this situation and if at any time I have reason to believe that the spirit and the letter of this resolution is not being lived up to, I will do in my opinion whatever is necessary concerning Lebanon to get our men back.

My colleagues, I have risen on many occasions over the last 2 years to oppose the President, and on several occasions when I believed him to be right I supported him. In this case, he initiated contact with me. You, the Members on this side of the aisle, you elected me as the Speaker of the House and JIM WRIGHT as your leader. We were speaking for you not as Democrats, but what we thought was truly right as Americans, that it was time to act in a bipartisan manner. And so as he contacted me, he wanted congressional support for his policies in Lebanon. I am willing to pledge my support as long as the War Powers Act is adhered to.

The debate here today is solemn and serious, and the concerns expressed are deeply held. The fate of a nation, Lebanon, awaits our action. This is not an easy decision for anyone. But, believe me, it is a necessary one, and a necessary one for our country and for the rest of the world.

Many of you may not like the War Powers Act, but it is doing today what it was intended to do. It is forcing the Congress to act rather than sit back and let the President act in its place. In this case, I hope we will act today to help the President to bring peace and stability in Lebanon, a country worthy of our attention, a country worthy of our assistance, a country worthy of our best efforts. I hope the resolution is adopted.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Joint Resolution 368, and that I may include tabular and extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. WHITTEN) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE), for purposes of debate only, pending which I yield myself such time as I may require.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I bring to the Members today a resolution that is urgent and essential.

On September 22, the Appropriations Committee reported a continuing resolution, which is necessary for various reasons because we had not completed work on all 13 appropriation bills making money available for the carrying on of the operations of the Government after this Friday. Under an opinion of the Attorney General, Government activities except those dealing with health, safety, and defense must cease as of midnight Friday, September 30, 1983, if appropriations for the agencies involved have not been enacted.

The resolution reported last week, as has been the case increasingly in the last few years, ended up as the vehicle where just about every controversy existing in Congress was addressed.

Mr. Speaker, because 19 amendments were adopted in the committee on the resolution last week, it attracted considerable controversy and it did not appear possible to have the resolution enacted by the end of the week. After consulting with some of the senior members of the Committee on Appropriations, a simplified continuing resolution (H.J. Res. 368) was introduced which in effect continues the operations of the Government basically at about the same level as we have now.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that this resolution has to be considered under somewhat unusual circumstances. May I say, though, that this is not the fault of the Appropriations Committee. Over the years, your committee has a fine record of fiscal responsibility and timely action. For 37 of the last 40 years, the Appropriations Committee has recommended funding levels below the President's budget requests.

The major reason we have had to resort to unusual practices this year is the inability of the legislative committees to resolve numerous controversial issues. I do not blame the legislative committees. But because certain issues are not resolved in the normal legislative manner, there is a growing tendency to try to resolve them in connection with the continuing resolution, which must be enacted by the start of the fiscal year. The amendments which the Appropriations Committee dealt with last week were almost exclusively concerned with legislative provisions and issues more properly addressed by the legislative committees. Very few of the amendments were concerned with money or spending rates.

We hate to be faced with this situation in which we find ourselves today, but with the end of the fiscal year fast approaching there was no other sensible way to proceed. The operation of the Government must not be suspended because legislative issues are not resolved properly and in a timely manner. Continuing resolutions, by their very nature, must be enacted promptly. But they are temporary, stop-gap measures and should not be used as vehicles for every legislative controversy.

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of my colleagues, I would like to explain the various provisions of House Joint Resolution 368 which are before the House today.

House Joint Resolution 368 provides interim financing for the new fiscal year beginning October 1 for programs under 9 of the 13 regular appropriaton bills. The following four bills have already become law: HUD-Independent Agencies (Public Law 98-45), Energy and Water Development (Public Law 98-50), Legislative Branch (Public Law 98-51), and Transportation (Public Law 98-78).

The resolution becomes effective at midnight September 30 and expires November 15, a period of only 46 days. The provisions of the continuing resolution automatically disengage as additional appropriation bills become law.

However, since all appropriation bills will not be enacted by September 30, timely enactment of this joint resolution is absolutely necessary in order to provide for the orderly continuation of numerous essential governmental activities.

STATUS OF APPROPRIATION BILLS

Progress this year on appropriation bills has been much better than last year, principally due to the fact that the committee proceeded on many bills based on the House-passed version of the first budget resolution in lieu of waiting for a final conference agreement. This action saved a number of weeks. Procedures such as this will be necessary in future years if the Congress is to make further progress toward the objective of enacting all the appropriation bills by the beginning of the new fiscal year.

It is anticipated that by the beginning of the new fiscal year the committee will have reported and the House will have pased 10 of the 13 appropriation bills for fiscal year 1984. The remaining three bills are Defense, Treasury-Postal Service, and General Government and Foreign Assistance. The Defense bill is being prepared in subcommittee and will be reported next month. A schedule for the foreign assistance bill is uncertain at this time. It is expected that the Treasury-Postal Service bill will be considered by the House in the near future.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress that the committee continues to be dedicated to the principle of financing Federal programs under the traditional authorization and appropriations process, which includes individual appropriation bills. Therefore, we will continue our efforts to get regular bills signed into law as soon as possible.

I would again like to emphasize that when regular bills are signed into law, the provisions of the continuing resolution automatically disengage and the regular appropriation bills then become the funding device. This continuing resolution in no way precludes subsequent enactment into law of the regular appropriation bills.

Notwithstanding the sharply improved performance of the Congress in handling appropriation bills, the timely enactment of this resolution is absolutely necessary in order to provide orderly continuation of numerous national security and civilian programs.

LEVELS OF FUNDING UNDER THE RESOLUTION

As I have stated, this continuing resolution provides interim financing for numerous Federal programs from October 1 until November 15, a period of only a month and a half.

Section 101(a) provides continuing authority for programs under two appropriation bills at rates of the lower of the levels in the House or Senate passed bills. If an existing program has been omitted from either the House or Senate version of the bill, it is automatically continued at the lower of the current level or the level provided by the one body. Bills containing programs continued under this subsection are: District of Columbia and Military Construction.

Section 101(b) provides continuing authority for programs under four appropriation bills at the rates contained in the bills as passed the House of Representatives. Bills containing programs continued under this subsection are: Agriculture, Commerce-Justice-State, Interior, and Labor-Health and Human Services and Education.

Section 101(c) provides continuing authority for programs for the Department of Defense at either the rate of last year's bill (Public Law 97-377) or the budget estimate, whichever is lower.

Section 101(d) provides continuing authority for the Treasury-Postal Service appropriation bill at the current rate.

Section 101(e) provides continuing authority for foreign assistance and related programs at current levels or at the budget estimate, whichever is lower.

Section 101(f) provides continuing authority at the current level for a number of specific programs.

At this point I would like to read from the committee report on House Joint Resolution 367 dealing with the professional standards review organizations program (PSRO). These organizations were authorized in 1972 to review the necessity and quality of medical care provided to medicare and medicaid beneficiaries. The Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 mandates substantial changes in this program. Basically the PSRO's will be replaced in fiscal year 1985 by a new system of statewide peer review organization which the Secretary of Health and Human Services must designate and sign contracts with by October 1, 1984. The President's original 1984 budget did not provide any funding for the PSRO's or other utilization review activities during the transition period. On September 15, 1983, however, the President amended his budget request to include $9 million for this purpose. Section 101(f) of the resolution insures that the existing network of PSRO's will continue to carry out utilization review until the new system is in place.

Of special interest to various Members of the House is section 101(g), which provides continuing authority for those programs which were stricken from the Commerce, Justice, State, and the Judiciary appropriations bill on technical points of order when the bill was considered and passed by the House of Representatives, at the rates contained in the bill (H.R. 3134) as originally reported to the House by the committee.

Also the resolution provides for the continuation of the existing provisions of law regarding the prohibition against preventing the implementation of programs of voluntary school prayer and meditation in the public schools. This provision would remain in effect during the duration of the continuing resolution.

OTHER TECHNICAL PROVISIONS OF THE RESOLUTION

The accompanying resolution carries the usual necessary technical provisions including those relating to obligations or expenditures made during the duration of the continuing resolution, the time requirement for the apportionment of funds, and modification of apportionment procedure to accommodate certain existing provisions of law.

At this point I would like to insert in the RECORD some language included in House Report 98-374 dealing with the Defense Department:

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

"In recent years, there has been a serious disagreement between legal interpretations by the Department of Defense and the intent of this Committee with respect to funding levels and new starts permitted under a continuing resolution. Much of the inconsistency centers around the interpretation of what is meant by a "project or activity". Therefore, the Department's legal opinions over the years have consistently held that the aggregate funds made available in each appropriation account, and not the projects and activities funded in each appropriation account, are the controlling factors with respect to new starts and funding level restrictions in continuing resolutions.

The report which accompanied the fiscal year 1983 continuing resolution passed by House prohibited the Department of Defense from funding new projects or activities which were not funded in fiscal year 1982. At that time, the Department was advised that it was the Committee's intent that no funds should be made available for new projects, new activities, new budget activities, new program elements, new subprojects within the program elements, new production of items not funded for production in fiscal year 1982, or for the increase in production rates above those sustained with fiscal year 1982 funds. It was stated that Congress should not be put in a position of being forced to fund programs on which it has not yet had an opportunity to express its will and therefore impinge on its flexibility in arriving at these final funding decisions.

Notwithstanding the above language, which the Committee felt was quite clear and unequivocal, a number of actions were taken by the Department which violated the intent of the fiscal year 1983 continuing resolution. Despite the Committee's descriptions of a project or activity, the Department interpreted a project or activity to be at the appropriation level.

A continuing resolution is a device designed to provide interim financing at restrictive rates for the forthcoming fiscal year until appropriation bills for certain departments and agencies covered by the resolution are signed into law by the President. It is a stop-gap measure that permits the operation of particular governmental entities covered under a continuing resolution until their individual appropriations become law. Because of previous legal interpretations by the Department of Defense as to congressional intent, the Committee deems it necessary to define a "project or activity" in the accompanying resolution.

Section 101(c) provides that during the period covered by this continuing resolution, the Department of Defense will be required to operate at a rate not in excess of the rate provided in last year's bill or at the rate provided for in the budget estimates, whichever is lower. No appropriation or funds made available or authority granted pursuant to the continuing resolution shall be used to initiate new production of items not funded for production in fiscal year 1983 or prior years, for an increase in production rates above those sustained with fiscal year 1983 funds, or to initiate or resume any project or activity. For purposes of this section of the resolution, a project or activity is defined as any project, subproject, activity, budget activity, program element, and subprogram within a program element. Such projects and activities are further defined as a P-1 line item in a budget activity within an appropriation account and an R-1 line item which includes a program element and subprogram element within an appropriation account, for which appropriations, funds, or other authority were not available during fiscal year 1983. In addition, for operating programs, such activities are further defined as new pay, allowances or programs. This new language should make it perfectly clear that the intent of the Committee is to prohibit the Department from utilizing the appropriation account level as a benchmark against which its funding restrictions apply.

Section 101(c) also provides that none of the funds appropriated or made available to the Department of Defense pursuant to the continuing resolution shall be available for initiation of multiyear procurement or for the conversion of any full-time positions in support of the Army Reserve, Air Reserve, Army National Guard, and Air National Guard by active or reserve military personnel from civilian positions designated "military technicians" to military positions. The purpose of this proviso is to prohibit further conversions of civilian "military positions" to Active Guard/Reserve military positions until the Committee has had an opportunity to address this controversial matter during mark-up of the fiscal year 1984 Defense Appropriation Bill.

Furthermore, section 101(f) stipulates that such amounts as may be necessary for continuing Army National Guard and Army Reserve Operation and Maintenance and National Guard and Reserve equipment procurement, not otherwise provided for in this joint resolution, which were conducted in fiscal year 1983, under the terms and conditions provided in applicable appropriation acts for fiscal year 1983, may be funded at the current rate. The Committee has strongly supported our Reserve components as an integral part of the total force concept. In recent years, funds have been appropriated above the budget estimates in order to modernize and supply in an expedited manner our Guard and Reserve forces in a concerted effort to make more meaningful this total force concept. The exception provided in section 101(f) is to assure there is no diminution of this modernization program during the 46 days covered by this resolution."

POSTAL SERVICE

Mr. Speaker, since many of my colleagues have asked me how we treat the Postal Service in this resolution I would like to state that this continuing resolution provides for payments into the Postal Service fund for the revenue foregone subsidy for the purpose of holding the line on postal rates for preferred rate mailers at the level in effect on September 1, 1983—step 14. If the subsidy is reduced, the Postal Service would be required by law to increase rates to make up the difference between rates charged and the amount required to handle such mail.

Since the budgets of so many domestic programs are being cut and the charitable institutions of this country, such as the American Cancer Society, the March of Dimes, and the American Lung Association, are being asked to increase their contributions, I believe that the imposition of substantial increases in postal rates for these mailers would not be advisable at this time. The continuing resolution also directs the continuation of 6-day mail delivery and rural delivery of mail at the 1983 level, and continues free mail for the blind and for overseas voting.

1984 AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATIONS BILL

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to present for the record the funding levels for the Department of Agriculture and related agencies in the continuing resolution.

For purposes of this resolution we have selected the House-passed level, and that level on an annual basis is:

$54 million under the President's budget; $88 million under the Senate-passed bill; $2.7 billion under the budget resolution; and $7.6 billion under the fiscal year 1983 appropriation.

The $2.7 billion under the budget resolution is reserved for supplementals for the feeding programs, which will be required to fully fund those programs and for other anticipated supplemental requests. The very large difference, compared with the 1983 appropriation, is due to restoration of losses to the Commodity Credit Corporation, which was $6.5 billion higher in 1983 than in 1984.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to stress that the continuing resolution carries with it those sections of the report from the Committee on Appropriations (H. Rept. 98-374, part 1) which are still applicable to this resolution. I would like to repeat the language that applies to the Department of Agriculture, since the committee intends that the Department comply with these instructions.

RELIEF NEEDED FOR AGRICULTURE

In order to restore the purchasing power of American agriculture, maintain the normal volume of domestic agricultural production, and protect our largest dollar earner in world trade, the committee will expect the Secretary of Agriculture to immediately take the following necessary steps:

First, as authorized by the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter, the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-98), and other acts, the Secretary of Agriculture shall set target prices that accurately reflect increase in cost of production. The Secretary shall also set production targets at levels that meet domestic needs, allow for adequate reserves, and provide a dependable market for world demand at competitive prices as authorized by the charter of the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Second, to prevent otherwise unavoidable shortages of food and fiber for the consumer, the Secretary shall make disaster loans or payments and/or provide feed grains promptly from the Commodity Credit Corporation to farmer-producers and ranchers who have suffered from the recent disastrous drought in order to assist such farmer-producers and ranchers to remain in business. Delays in processing disaster applications are inexcusable in view of the severity of the drought. The committee believes the Secretary must act expeditiously to prevent widespread bankruptcies of farmer-producers and ranchers and to assure adequate supplies of food and fiber for the Nation's consumers.

AGRICULTURE ESSENTIAL

Mr. Speaker, it must be remembered that agriculture, as an industry, is bigger than the auto, steel, and housing industries combined. Agriculture is the biggest industry and employer in our country, and the farmer is in the worst trouble since the Great Depression. Industry and labor, nor the country, can afford to let it go further toward financial ruin.

Since 1945, after World War II, the farmer's share of the consumer dollar has dropped from 51 percent to 31 percent last year—while, of course, labor and industry's share has increased from 49 percent to 69 percent for the same period.

The farmer's cost, since he buys from industry and labor, has gone up almost 1,100 percent since 1945; his investment has increased almost 1,200 percent; but his price is only up 300 percent.

Yet we have refused to sell by not making our offering price competitive when we are dependent on exporting the production from 2 out of every 5 acres. This amounts to an embargo, all of which helps only our competitors. American industry and labor cannot afford to give up their biggest customer. The American consumer cannot afford to give up his best and least expensive supplier. And, our Federal Government cannot afford to give up its biggest dollar earner in world trade. Our Department of Agriculture can no longer claim that reducing prices and volume when costs continue going up and up is anything except disastrous to everybody.

In a hungry world, this country cannot afford to hold back on food for hungry people, while sending them guns and weapons of war which the people do not need but their leaders want—as status symbols or for civil war.

It must be remembered that agriculture represents our greatest advantage over the Communist world. An abundant supply of food and fiber is a material influence for international goodwill, our balance of trade, and improved relations with other nations, and absolutely vital to our domestic economy.

EXISTING PROGRAMS MAINTAINED

Mr. Speaker, the House-passed bill, which, by the way, differs only slightly from the Senate-passed bill, is almost the same as the bills enacted by the Congress and signed by the President for 1982 and 1983. To illustrate this I will, at this point, provide two tables for the RECORD which compare budget authority and loan levels for fiscal years 1982, 1983, and 1984.

Mr. Speaker, the Agriculture, Rural Development, and Related Agencies Appropriations bill for fiscal year 1984 maintains existing agriculture programs at the 1983 levels, provides needed funding for the feeding programs at the levels required under existing law, and provides the funding to meet the urgent needs of farmers and ranchers resulting from the recent drought.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we offer to the Members this joint resolution as a means to hold things together, and merely continue operations for a brief period. That is the reason we asked the Rules Committee to go along with us. That is the reason I did not take it back to the committee and so all my friends might have to take the positions they took before. But I assure the Members that I talked to many people and there was general agreement this was the way to proceed. The Rules Committee cooperated, and the leadership on both sides of the aisle cooperated in an effort to keep the Government running and avoid having the Congress in session all weekend. We bring you a resolution that, insofar as I can tell, is the best that anyone could do under the very serious situation we face.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to ask, as the gentleman knows, some 130 Members of this House signed a letter to the Rules Committee requesting that an amendment be allowed to prohibit funding for the Clinch River breeder reactor. That is not in the bill.

My question to the distinguished chairman would be, should the Senate add either language or funding for the Clinch River breeder reactor, what the distinguished chairman's position would be in conference.

Mr. WHITTEN. Let me say to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, there is not a dollar in this bill for Clinch River. The gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BEVILL), who is chairman of the subcommittee with jurisdiction over the Clinch River project, has stated and I will confirm what he said, that if provision for Clinch River is made on the Senate side, it will be brought back for a separate vote in the House, and the gentleman has my assurance on that.

Mr. COUGHLIN. The chairman would assure us that the House conferees would suppport the position of the House?

Mr. WHITTEN. I cannot precisely predict the conferees' actions, especially even before they are appointed, but I am sure the House conferees would do their utmost to support the House position.

Mr. COUGHLIN. And we would have a separate vote in that case?

Mr. WHITTEN. That is right.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank the distinguished chairman.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTEN. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I appreciate the fact that the continuing resolution is a slimmed down version of the continuing resolutions that we have had in the past and I appreciate that.

There is one question I would like to ask the gentleman and it refers to the funding in the bill for foreign aid as it relates to El Salvador. As I understand, there is some $64,800,000 that is available in the bill during the 45-day period that is covered by the continuing resolution. This is the whole amount for the entire year for aid to El Salvador.

The specific question that I am asking, Is it the intention of the Appropriations Committee that that $64 million would be expended over the course of the entire year or would it be apportioned and spent only in this 45-day period?

Mr. WHITTEN. May I say that special attention was paid to consideration of foreign aid in the continuing resolution. One of the difficulties we had was determining what the rate for operations should be when there was not yet action on a 1984 bill. We had a hard job deciding what would be fair. We used the level that we had this year, including the amounts in the 1983 supplemental and compared them with the budget estimates in determining the rate. So the gentleman is right about the amount of money.

I have a statement on the spending rates for El Salvador. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) is in charge of that subcommittee and I will let him present it. We have been assured that as far as the administration is concerned, spending for El Salvador will be at the regular rate, unless something unexpected occurs.

Mr. LONG of Maryland, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTEN. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, this question was raised with William Schneider, Jr., the Under Secretary for Security Assistance, Science and Technology, of the Department of State. His response was that under any foreseeable circumstances, the administration would not obligate or spend the entire amount of money during the 45-day period covered by this continuing resolution. Rather, he stated that the administration would proceed approximately on a proportional annualized basis. This would result in a reduction of spending compared to the current level.

I might say, if they violate that intent, I think they will be running great risk to the future.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, may I say to my colleague, that is not only true here, but if the executive branch wishes to cooperate with the Congress, and as far as I know they do, they will understand that what we want is for things to go along as they have been; so that while it may not be required in each instance we expect them to do that for the 45-day duration of this continuing resolution.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further just for one additional question, I understand and I appreciate the language that has been put in about phasing over the course of the year the commitment for the $64 million.

The question, though, also comes to me that we have operated in fiscal year 1983 under certain obligations of the President to report to us in terms of human rights violations. It is my understanding that those regulations that we put into the law in 1983 in fact expire as of September 30 and that this bill does not guarantee that during that 45-day period the President has to comply with those regulations.

Mr. WHITTEN. May I say again, as far as the executive branch is interested in cooperating with the Congress, it would go ahead for this period as they have in times past. It may not be specifically required in certain instances, but it is expected.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTEN. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Since we have no report to refer to because of the procedure that was used, can the gentleman assure me that the fund limitations as they are now in the law with regard to abortion, school prayer, and other various matters, are included under the continuing resolution?

Mr. WHITTEN. May I say that the resolution here ties itself to the bill we passed on Labor-Health and Human Services and Education which included those prohibitions.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, the funding levels that the gentleman describes sound to me to be within the budget figures. Are all the figures that are included in this appropriation within the annual budget request that has passed the Congress?

Mr. WHITTEN. I do not know that I could answer that in detail for every single budget account because this covers just about the whole Government, except for four bills which have been signed into law. Every effort has been made to carry things on as they are.

May I say that while it may not be item by item within the President's budget, the total is within the congressional budget, and for all nine of the bills covered here, we have been careful to stay within the section 302 plan of the Appropriations Committee and reserve to the Congress the allocation of resources among the various programs. So I say to the gentleman we have stayed within it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, is the gentleman aware of any specific items where we are exceeding the budget in this particular bill?

Mr. WHITTEN. Well, as I say, this is a continuing resolution, and we have tried to be restrictive so that we can bring each of the regular bills up item by item and let the House work its will if they wish to make it up by reducing other items; so that is a matter for the people's branch of the Congress to determine. In the overall we stay within the limit.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTEN. I yield to the distinguished gentleman.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I would like to address and answer the question raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the human rights aspects of the El Salvador money.

It is true that we do not have anything specifically in the language, but we have informally received major concessions from the Salvadoran Government on the matter of human rights.

First, they have agreed to release and have released over 500 prisoners in various prisons and detention centers and they have given us the names.

Second, they have opened up the prisons and detention centers to let the International Red Cross come in on an unannounced and unrestricted basis to see whether prisoners are being mistreated or held without due process.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I support House Joint Resolution 368.

This resolution is being considered under a rule that effectively precludes amendments. The debate over the rule, and over individual amendments, has tended to obscure the underlying structure of the continuing resolution itself, which was carefully drawn to continue Federal programs at rates and conditions that reflect the most recent action by the Congress, and which allow the Congress and the executive branch to reach agreement on the seven appropriation bills which will remain to be considered during the period from October 1 to November 15.

In theory, continuing resolutions should be politically neutral, continuing programs at minimum levels so that the real political decisions can be made in the appropriations process.

This year, thanks to hard work by our committee, the leadership of the chairman, support from the leadership, and an attitude of accommodation in the administration, we have four bills enacted into law, and will have two more signed within a week. It is generally agreed that the continuing resolution should run only through November 15, and that 45 days will be used for consideration of the remaining appropriation bills.

It is important for Members to understand that because we have gotten so much done, so early, we face a situation which is fundamentally different from previous years, when the first continuing resolution carried virtually the entire Government, and when there was real disagreement and uncertainty whether the resolution would run for a short period, or far into the fiscal year.

There will be action on the remaining appropriation bills.

And there will be a second continuing resolution.

At that time we can address the problems of individual Members that have not been settled by the enactment of appropriations bills.

At this point I would like to review the provisions of the resolution itself.

The resolution covers nine appropriations bills, although two of these will be enacted within the week. Appropriations are made available until November 15, or until the appropriation is enacted, or until an appropriation bill is enacted without any provision for the item, whichever occurs first.

The rates and conditions for individual bills are generally consistent with past practice; that is, they reflect congressional action as of October 1.

D.C. and military construction are carried at the House rate or the Senate rate, whichever is lower, and under the more restrictive authority.

Agriculture, Commerce-Justice, Interior, and Labor-HHS are carried at the rate, and under the conditions, of the bill as passed the House. Those items in the Commerce bill which were stricken by point of order on the House floor are continued at the rate, and under the conditions, of the House-reported bill.

Defense is continued at the current rate, or the budget estimate, whichever is lower, and under the terms and conditions of the current fiscal year.

Foreign aid is continued at the rate provided in the 1983 continuing resolution and the 1983 supplemental, or the budget estimate, whichever is lower, and the more restrictive authority.

The Treasury bill is carried at the rate, and under the terms and conditions, of the current fiscal year.

Special provision is made for several unauthorized Labor-HHS programs, preferred rate mail, funds for the Chicago consent decree, and the Board for International Broadcasting.

All in all, this is a clean continuing resolution.

There is not a single provision in here which can be considered a special interest item.

Chairman WHITTEN and the Rules Committee have shown a great deal of political courage in standing up to the special interests that would have turned this resolution into a Christmas tree—or at least a Thanksgiving turkey.

They deserve your support, and this resolution deserves your vote.

If there is any doubt in the mind of any Member as to what will happen if this resolution is defeated, or delayed past October 1, I quote from the OMB memorandum of September 22, 1983, regarding "agency operations in the absence of appropriations":

> OMB will inform affected agencies at approximately 2:00 p.m., Friday, September 30, if it appears with reasonable certainty that an acceptable continuing resolution will be signed during the weekend of October 1-2. If it does not appear that one will be signed, agency shutdown plans should be implemented.

These agency shutdown plans will include the Department of Defense, administration of the social security program, payments to States for unemployment compensation, and all of the nutrition programs, including food stamps, to mention just a few of the more interesting consequences.

Vote yes, and let us send this resolution on its way.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to review some of the individual subcommittees covered by the resolution.

The continuing resolution provides funding for foreign assistance programs at the fiscal 1983 funding level. Including supplementals, or the President's fiscal 1984 budget requests level, whichever is lower for each program or activity.

Congress has not enacted regular foreign assistance authorizing or appropriations bills since 1981. It is my hope that such legislation will be brought to the floor before the end of this session. Our Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations has tentatively scheduled mark up of the fiscal 1984 bill for next Wednesday, October 5. I strongly urge the Foreign Affairs Committee and the leadership to bring the authorization bill to the floor as soon as possible, so that our committee might have guidance as we recommend funding levels for these programs.

In the meantime, this resolution will provide interim funding until November 15 or until the regular appropriations bill is enacted. Annual funding levels for selected programs are as follows:

For Israel, $785 million in economic support funds and $1.7 billion in foreign military sales, $550 million of which is forgiven from repayment. Because of the funding formula of the resolution, the amount of forgiven FMS credits is $200 million less than Israel is receiving in fiscal 1983. The need for a regular fiscal 1984 bill is clearly evident in the case of Israel, as the expected funding levels in that bill would be $910 million in economic support funds and $1.7 billion in FMS, of which $850 million, or half, would be forgiven.

For Egypt, $750 million in economic support funds and $1.275 billion in foreign military sales, of which $425 million would be forgiven from repayment. The total assistance of $2.025 billion is $50 million less than Egypt will receive in fiscal 1983 and $25 million less than the President's request for fiscal 1984 due to the funding formula in this resolution. Again, we need to enact the fiscal 1984 appropriations bill.

For the International Development Association (IDA), the soft loan window of the World Bank, $945 million. This is the same amount provided in fiscal 1983, but $150 million below the President's request for fiscal 1984.

For international organizations and programs, $240 million, the President's request. I regret that the funding formula results in reductions below fiscal 1983 levels for important U.S. contributions to the U.N. development program, UNICEF, the World Food Program and other agencies. I was successful in full committee in securing additional funding for this account in the resolution reported by our committee September 22, but that resolution was subsequently referred to other committees for a quiet burial. This is one more reason we need to pass the fiscal 1984 bill.

For American schools and hospitals abroad, $7.5 million, the President's request. This is a reduction of $12.5 million below the fiscal 1983 level for this program which provides important support for institutions such as the American University of Beirut, Beirut University College and many other American educational and health organizations located abroad. It is critical, especially in Lebanon, that we maintain or increase our support at this time. I intend to do what I can in getting the regular bill to include increased funding for this account.

LABOR, HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES, AND EDUCATION

For the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education, and related agencies, House Joint Resolution 368 provides funding for the programs considered in H.R. 3913, the Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education appropriations bill for fiscal year 1984, at the levels provided in that bill as passed by the House, and under the terms and conditions provided in that bill as passed by the House.

In addition, House Joint Resolution 368 provides funding for the following programs which were not considered in H.R. 3913, because their authorizations were not in place, at the rate and under the terms and conditions applicable for fiscal year 1983:

Health planning;

Research training programs in the National Institutes of Health, the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration, as well as nurse training fellowships;

Certain advisory boards in the National Institutes of Health;

Medical library assistance programs;

Refugee and entrant resettlement programs;

Child abuse prevention and treatment and certain adoption opportunities activities;

Vocational rehabilitation programs; and ACTION.

For one program not funded under H.R. 3913, professional standards review organizations, funding is provided in House Joint Resolution 368 at the current rate.

For impact aid programs, action on which was deferred in H.R. 3913, funding is provided at an annual rate of $585 million, in conformance with the authorization recently enacted into law as part of the Defense Authorization Act, under the terms and conditions applicable in fiscal year 1983.

Finally, $20 million is provided by transfer from carryover guaranteed student loan funds, to remain available through September 30, 1984, in connection with an ongoing court case involving the United States and the Chicago Board of Education. No final disposition has yet been reached concerning the obligations of the Federal Government or the Secretary of Education with respect to a consent decree entered between these parties in 1980.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

Abortion: No funds in this act shall be used to perform abortions (sec. 204).

School prayer—Section 307: No funds under this act shall be used to prevent implementation of programs of voluntary prayer and mediation.

School busing—Section 305(b): No funds shall be used for the transportation of students or teachers in order to overcome racial imbalance in any school, or to carry out a plan of racial desegregation.

Section 306: No funds shall be used to require transportation of any student to a school other than the school which is nearest to the student's home (except for special education needs).

Sections 304, 305(a): No funds shall be used to force a school which is considered under the law to be desegregated to bus or otherwise transfer students from one school to another as a condition to obtaining Federal funds, or otherwise.

TREASURY/POSTAL SERVICE

Section 106: This section places a ceiling on the standard level user charge for square footage rates for all Government space in 1984, to the 1982 SLUC rates plus 14 percent. Under existing law, GSA charges Government tenants for Government occupied space, both commercial and Government-owned, at a rate comparable to the rate charged by the private sector in the same area.

Section 108: This section specifies that preferred rates for certain mailers (nonprofit organizations, charity groups, and so forth) are to be held at the step 14 level, which means a funding level of $879 million for fiscal year 1984. This is the figure which the various nonprofit groups hoped to attain.

Section 110: This section puts a cap on the pay increases for Federal blue collar and certain other workers, limiting such raises to the same percentage as that for white-collar workers. This is a money saving move the administration wants. Were it not for this provision, blue-collar workers would receive pay raises at the local prevailing rates (union scales), which in turn would cost around $1 billion in Federal funds.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I want to thank the gentleman for his detailed explanation of what is in the bill. I think that is very helpful.

One of the problems that I have with his explanation was with the characterization of the bill on Commerce, Justice, and State, where he indicated that the House level figures would prevail. In some cases those House level figures were above budget. For those of us who would be concerned about that, what the gentleman is saying is those are places where we might find items that exceeded the budget, is that correct?

Mr. CONTE. That is exactly right. The gentleman is absolutely right. However, hopefully that is one of the target bills that we hope to clean up in these 45 days which will have time to go to conference with the Senate and try to clean those up. And we will all have a shot at it, we will have a vote on that bill when it gets back here out of conference.

Mr. WALKER. I want to thank the gentleman for his explanation. It is a little bit better than saying what is under was over and what is over was under.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CONTE. I worked very, very hard with the Senate on this continuing resolution. I told the gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) and a member of the Rules Committee please give us a clean bill. You see what happened downstairs before our full committee. We had 19 amendments. And if this thing was opened up today, I bet we would have 50 amendments here. And you would be here Saturday, and you would be here Sunday. And I went over to the Senate and talked to the leadership over there and said to them, look, we are going to have a clean bill here, the House has shown discipline, and it is high time that that other body start showing some discipline, too.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE) who has worked very closely with us in this, and all our colleagues in the Congress. We are glad that you appreciate the problems that we have had here. I want to express my thanks to the Rules Committee and to the membership for their support in what we are presenting you with. It is like I say, we have tried cleanly and fairly and promptly to meet our problems, continuing from now to November 15, substantially as we have been going. That is what a continuing resolution is supposed to be. We respect and thank you for your support.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. McCOLLUM).

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, I respect the bipartisan nature of this. I certainly do not intend my remarks to be any criticism whatsoever to the hard work of the committee that put this together. But, I do feel compelled to point out to my colleagues that included in this continuing resolution, and we need to revise it later on because I think we will and I pray we have the opportunity to do so, there are substantial and significant changes to the doings of the Legal Services Corporation which adversely, in my judgment and the judgment of many others, will impact the doings of that organization.

As you recall, in the last Congress we passed some significant changes to Legal Services Corporation which would depoliticize them. This continuing resolution picks up on the Judiciary Committee passed bill this time for authorization of this which has never come before the floor of the House yet for debate. In that process we are adopting tonight changes which would do away with local bar control of Legal Services Corporation activities. We are adopting provisions which would allow Legal Services to go back into the lobbying business again, and we are opening the door for the 12 million or so illegal aliens here to be allowed to have the services of Legal Services lawyers and thereby spread the opportunity away from the poor people who this corporation was intended to serve.

I only take the time to point this out because I think it is unfortunate that this is here without the opportunity which I understand why for debate or for elimination, and I urge the leadership to allow us as quickly as possible through the authorization process as appropriate to have the time to come back and revise this as indicated.

Again, I commend the Members for their hard work and appreciate it, and thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for allowing me the time.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California (Mr. ROYBAL).

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to enter into a colloquy with the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. NATCHER). With regard to the refugee resettlement program, I understand that section 101(f) of the continuing resolution requires that this program be continued at the current rate under the terms and conditions provided in the applicable 1983 Appropriations Act. That would clearly mean that the Department of Health and Human Services must conduct the various grant activities of the refugee program under existing regulations during the continuing resolution. Have I correctly stated the statutory requirement of section 101(f)?

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. ROYBAL. In light of this requirement, am I correct in stating that the Department lacks authority under the continuing resolution to block grant or consolidate the refugee program without specific legislative authorization?

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is correct. Section 101(f) prevents such an administrative proposal from being implemented during the continuing resolution.

Mr. ROYBAL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, like Mr. YATES and others on the Appropriations Committee, I am concerned with a matter involving the Chicago city schools and the judicial impoundment of fiscal year 1983 education funds. In particular, my concern is with the status of frozen fiscal year 1983 funds once the current fiscal year ends. It is my understanding that these fiscal year 1983 education funds will be carried over into the next fiscal year and that they will not lapse as a result of the judicial impoundment. Second, it is also my belief that the transfer of $20 million from the 1983 "guaranteed student loan" account enables the Secretary of Education to comply with the consent decree concerning the Chicago city schools and, this transfer of funds also enables the Secretary to comply with the provisions of the fiscal year 1983 appropriations law and to fund all activities affected by the judicial impoundment in proportion to the amount they otherwise would have been funded.

I congratulate Mr. YATES of Illinois for his leadership and assistance on this matter.

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, this continuing resolution looks pretty good on its face. The bill provides $187.9 billion in discretionary outlays, and $204.3 billion in mandatory outlays. Compared to the Appropriations Committee's own 302(b) targets, it is $16.5 billion under in outlays, and $36.4 billion under in budget authority.

Compared to the budget resolution adjusted yesterday to reflect current conditions, spending for fiscal year 1984, assuming enactment of this bill, House Joint Resolution 368, will be $881.2 billion in budget authority and $833.7 billion in outlays. If no other spending is appropriated, we will be under budget in fiscal year 1984 by $42.1 billion in budget authority and $19.2 billion in outlays.

Unfortunately, an annual costing out of this bill is misleading. If House Joint Resolution 368 were appropriating funds for the entire fiscal year, we could apply the $19.2 billion savings against the deficit and make some headway in bringing the threatening deficits down. But House Joint Resolution 368 will only appropriate funds through November 15. It is only a stopgap measure, and there is little doubt that the $19.2 billion and more will be spent in later supplementals or continuing resolutions.

For a stopgap measure, however, this continuing resolution is not bad. Some of the Christmas tree ornaments which adorned the earlier version were not included in this more restrained version. Representative WHITTEN should be applauded for introducing this second "skinnier" version of the bill. Unfortunately, we don't know how skinny it is.

A specific problem with House Joint Resolution 368 is the additional $20 million that has been quietly tacked onto this bill. Instead of debating and voting on the override of the President's veto of a $20 million for the highly controversial United States of America against Board of Education of the City of Chicago court case, the Committee simply buries it in the continuing resolution and hopes it squeezes by.

I agree that the discretionary education programs need their funding and should receive it. However, I understand that this $20 million appropriation is going to Chicago, not to the education programs. There is no written guarantee that with this appropriation for education funds will be unfrozen. Currently, Judge Shadur has agreed to free $4 million in funds so that the education programs may continue. It is the very minimum action he could take. It will allow the education programs to continue to provide their services while the courts continue to battle this case.

Yet instead of holding the line, and awaiting, the appeal of this case, we are simply giving our authority to the judge in a very questionable case. We are setting a dangerous precedent. I am disappointed that the Congress is attempting to resolve this important case in such a frivolous and arbitrary manner. I hope that this appropriation will be removed in conference.

In providing funds for the programs authorized for fiscal year 1984, it is essential that we enforce spending discipline. Unauthorized programs should not be funded, but House Joint Resolution 368 contains funding for a dozen or more unauthorized programs.

That is ample reason for a negative vote.

Another reason for a no vote is that we really do not know what is in this bill. The committee chairman either cannot, or will not, tell us. We know about the Chicago matter. We do not know how many other "little Chicagos" may lurk within this resolution.

With so little information, a no vote is always the safest course.●

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MINISH). Pursuant to House Resolution 317, the previous question is considered as ordered.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. MILLER OF OHIO

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the joint resolution?

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. I am, Mr. Speaker, in its present form.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MILLER of Ohio moves to recommit House Joint Resolution 368 to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the grounds that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 261, nays 160, not voting 12, as follows:

TRIBUTE TO DICK THORNTON

(Mr. PANETTA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay special tribute today to Dick Thornton, who is retiring from the Grower-Shipper Vegetable Association in Salinas, Calif., after over 10 years of service to the agricultural industry in my district.

Dick Thornton's record reveals a keen understanding and knowledge of the issues important to California agriculture. After service as a naval aviator during World War II, Dick worked with Western Growers Association in Los Angeles, California-Arizona Farm Labor Association in Fresno, and as executive vice president of the National Council of Agricultural Employers in Washington, D.C., before moving to the Grower-Shipper Association. His hands-on experience ranges from the fields of California to the Halls of Congress, and covers the wide spectrum of issues which affect the lives and livelihoods of central California farmers.

What Dick's record cannot recognize fully, however, is his unique ability to represent those farmers—by nature independent, hard working, and dedicated to a strong agriculture—and to keep the vital lines of communication open. Dick has provided an invaluable service from California agriculture and for those in my district and throughout the State who are dependent on this vital industry.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend to Dick my heartfelt congratulations and best wishes for future success—as well as my hope and belief that when we need his wisdom and guidance in the future, he will not be too far away.

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN FAMINE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. RITTER) is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor for me to rise with my colleagues this evening in solemn commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the Ukrainian holocaust.

As cochairman of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Baltic and Ukraine and as a human being deeply sympathetic with the concerns of Ukrainian people the world over for the tragedy their ancestors endured I rise today.

As we mark this important event and remember those who suffered untold agony and deprivation, let us also think of Ukrainians today who are forced to live under totalitarian rule of the Soviet Government. Their suffering and continued struggle for freedom stands as a monument of strength to the Ukrainian people and the Ukrainian nation.

Names such as Mykola Rudenko, Myroslav Marynovych, Oles Shevchenko incarcerated, lives broken, residing in Camp No. 36 in Perm in the RSFSR. It is to these people and to their struggle that I dedicated my remarks today.

I would like to commend also in my remarks the English language Ukrainian Weekly which has devoted many a part of their issues this year to covering the events and the history of this famine of 50 years ago and I salute the Ukrainian Weekly on its 50th anniversary and editor Roma Sochan Hadzewycz.

I would like to thank my colleague and friend the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON) for joining me to cosponsor this special order.

My colleagues this century has been witness to gross crimes against humanity. And the terms genocide, holocaust appear all too frequently in the annals of recent history. We almost take these terms for granted.

Ukrainians, Jews, Cambodians, Afghans, and others have all been and are victims of the wanton destruction and death that is the result and that are results of totalitarian government. As a nation and as a people committed to humaneness amongst people it is our duty to do what we can so that such barbaric acts must never be allowed to occur again.

Throughout its history Ukraine has been the breadbasket for central Europe and Russia. The Ukrainian farmer was one of the most industrious farmers in the world and his work created a comfortable life for his family and others. And the sufficient supply of food was his trademark. The rich, black soil of the Ukraine has always been a tempting prize for invaders from the Mongols in the 12th century to the Germans several decades ago.

In all cases the invaders were eventually repulsed in some measure by the bravery of Ukrainians individually and united as a people.

However, the rise of the Soviet state and the rise to leadership of Josef Stalin gave prominence to a new type of enemy for the Ukrainian people. Viewing Ukrainians as too independent and coveting for his own control the potential of their rich farmlands, Stalin masterminded and orchestrated a diabolical way to wrest control of this rich land and then destroy the independence and the will of the Ukrainian people.

His plan, forced collectivization, sought to bring all these lands under state control. And in the bleak, dark years of 1932 and 1933 Stalin used every means possible to deprive Ukrainians of their harvests. Armed thugs, gangsters, murderers, reminiscent of Hitler's special guards, the SS, went about their work, went about their dirty work. They stole, destroyed, ruined all available foods in the Ukraine and when food was not brought in from elsewhere the result was predictable, the population starved.

Now mankind has known famine in different parts of the world, famine brought about by war, drought, flood and other natural disasters. But never and nowhere have any people suffered so devastating a famine as that inflicted as a matter of policy by the Soviet Government against the Ukrainian people in the years 1932 and 1933.

The horror of millions of people dying of starvation and malnutrition while available food was being taken away and being exported from the Ukraine will never be forgotten. At the time newspapers throughout the world called on governments to force the Soviets to stop their continued starvation and famine policy. However, the Soviet Government responded in its usual way, no different from today: it ignored the outcry of world opinion.

During this 1-year period, over 7 million Ukrainians perished. It took the Nazis 5 years to destroy 6 million people, using sophisticated technology. It took the Soviet Government 1 year to destroy 7 million people. Unfortunately, this holocaust has not received the attention that it should, and unfortunately, while the Nazis were defeated and while their works against humanity have been widely distributed and communicated and published, this particular crime is less known. Few people except scholars and survivors know the suffering, the agony, people of whole villages lying around dying from hunger. This is a story that we must bring to the world and why I consider it an honor to speak today on behalf of those 7 million, on behalf of the survivors and on behalf of the Ukrainian nation which suffers under the Soviet yoke yet today. It is an honor to participate in the many events that will occur here and around the United States to commemorate what happened 50 years ago.

It is interesting to note that the Soviet Union outdid its moral twin, Nazi Germany, with time to spare.

Our Nation has been fortunate that war, surrender, famine has not been brought to our shores from foreign powers. It is hard for Americans to imagine the suffering of the Ukrainian people. Who would believe that a government would have a policy that would foster such a situation? It was hard for Americans to believe that this same government would shoot down an unarmed civilian airliner just a few short weeks ago. But I think now they believe it. It is hard for the American people to believe that a policy of genocide exists against the Afghan people to this very day, 4 million fleeing the country, 1 million dead. It is hard for the American people to comprehend that a government would have a policy of such brutality. But that is exactly what has happened and that is what is happening.

In the Ukraine 50 years ago, the old were the first to feel the severity of malnutrition and starvation.

Their tired bodies, as a result of a lifetime of hard work, slowly deteriorated into gaunt, featureless beings. They walked the streets and roads of the cities and villages, moving almost without motion or in slow motion, without purpose, and dying slowly, sometimes in a group, usually cold and alone. Death came to them without any dignity and without any justification and agonizingly, whole villages that at one time were thriving centers of activity slowly turned into abandoned shells. People began to move on in search of food and away from the growing groups of marauders that would attack towns and villages in gangs and kill wantonly. These marauders were driven to such depths by hunger, and they were many times motivated by the Stalinist forces. Men tried in vain to eke out some existence and to defend their homes and families, but slowly they began to lose their strength and die. This left then the women and the children. There are few sights more beautiful than a mother comforting her child, and there are few sights more shocking and sad than a mother trying to protect a child from certain death.

The children perhaps suffered the worst of the famine. Their eyes sunk into the hollow depths of their skulls, their stomachs were bloated beyond description, their mournful gaze searched beseechingly for someone to drop a few kernels of grain into their cupped hands. For some, death was quick; but for others, the scars and vivid memories would be something they would carry the rest of their lives.

There are stories told of slaughterhouses that would buy children for the purposes of killing them and then selling their salted meat as food under the guise of horse meat. One can only imagine the irony of a mother seeking food for her surviving family and eating meat that may have been at one time her child.

These are incredibly brutal stories. But they must be known. They must be known by the American people, by all free people. This is a legacy that lives on today. And if one is to come to grips with the perpetrators of this legacy, one must understand it and acknowledge it in detail. There are stories of trains racing through the Ukraine with their curtains drawn so that passengers would not have to witness the sight of mothers throwing half dead children under the wheels of the train to grant them a quick death. There are stories of bodies emaciated beyond description lying on the streets and roads, left to die alone.

Memories of the Ukrainian famine should haunt every civilized man, woman, and child, as the Holocaust against the Jews and other peoples of Eastern Europe haunt the memory of man today. These stories should not be left to scholars alone. They need to be told in schools and churches so that the horrible memory may in some way prevent this from happening again. And, yes, teach the survivors and the people today about the character of the perpetrators.

No people should have to suffer the kinds of horrors that Ukrainians did. Yet despite our best attempts, the best attempts of civilized people to eradicate this kind of barbarity, it still continues. As we speak, Soviet helicopter gunships capable of spewing 8,000 rounds of ammunition a minute are an instrument used in the destruction of Afghanistan. Everything from chemicals and biological weapons to small objects that appear as toys, a butterfly, a pin, that are capable of blowing off a limb of some small curious child in order to keep the parents at home. This is what the Soviets are committing today—another genocide, another holocaust perpetrated against the Afghan people.

I ask my colleagues and the people of this country: Will we some day stand at this podium, before this august body, and commemorate the 50th anniversary of some Afghan holocaust? Or will we have the courage to stand up today and demand that something be done? Will we ignore them, as we did the Ukrainians? Or will we give the Afghan freedom fighters the wherewithal to defend themselves from the same people who perpetrated the Ukrainian holocaust?

For my colleagues I would like to extend some things I have learned in our own hemisphere about another genocide that is being committed. In the country of Nicaragua the Miskito Indians are facing genocide at the hands of the totalitarian Sandinistas. The Sandinista regime, backed militarily and financially by the Soviet Union, and aided and abetted by the Soviet international fighting force consisting of Vietnamese, North Koreans, Czechs, Bulgarians, and Cubans, are using virtually every method they can to destroy the spirit and independence and bring the Miskito Indians into submission.

Of 259 churches, 162 have been closed, 59 burned to the ground, whole villages devastated and the people relocated into concentration camps, many of whom are starving the way Ukrainians starved 50 years ago.

Again, I ask my colleagues: Will we stand up and help or will we examine it from afar and watch it all happen? Mr. Speaker, the Ukrainian people are a brave people. We honor them today and share in their tragedy. But I can assure my colleagues that they are one people who will not give in to the destruction of their national identity. Attempts at Sovietization, Russianization, Russifying them, have all but failed because of the strength of their culture and their desire to pass on their rich history and tradition to their children.

This year has been set aside as an entire year of commemoration and it is all fitting and proper that Congress recognizes this event and uses its wisdom to help prevent the recurrence of similar events. I commend my colleagues to participate in events of this kind, one of which will occur this Sunday in Washington, D.C., where there will be a major demonstration of Ukrainian-Americans coming from all over the country, speeches, and then a march on the Soviet Embassy.

As long as a free Ukraine exists in our hearts, hope for a free Ukrainian nation remains a reality. This is a struggle I, for one, accept and I welcome the participation of my colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank all of the Members who have participated in this special order and commend their contributions.

Mr. HANCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RITTER. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HANCE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I applaud the gentleman on his remarks and certainly join with him in the statements. I think they are very appropriate for this time.

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RITTER. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. CARPER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. RITTER) for his statements this evening and I would like to associate myself with his remarks. I would also like to make the following brief statement:

Mr. Speaker, the Soviet-perpetrated genocide of the Ukrainian people in the 1930's was one of the most heinous crimes in the history of mankind. Yet tragically, Russia's reprehensible action has gone completely unpunished and virtually unrecorded by historians.

Mr. Speaker, that is why we are here this evening—to set the record straight, to let the world know that America has not forgotten the plight of the Ukrainian people, then or now.

Led by our dedicated and determined Ukrainian-American community, the people of Delaware are planning a series of events to solemnly commemorate the 50th anniversary of the famine in the Ukraine. Their efforts and energy should be applauded.

October 9 through 16 in Delaware has been declared Ukrainian Famine Week. On October 13, the University of Delaware is hosting a special symposium on Stalinist genocide—a symposium in which I have the honor of participating. On October 16, a special ecumenical service will be conducted at the Ukrainian Orthodox Church in Wilmington.

In just a few days, Mr. Speaker, over 150 of my constituents will join thousands of other Americans in coming to the Nation's Capital to participate in a commemorative vigil for the victims of the Soviets' unspeakable atrocities in the Ukraine. Among the activities planned for the October 2 vigil are a rally and a march on the Soviet Embassy.

The people of the Ukraine continue to resist the yoke of Soviet totalitarianism. The world must never forget the horrible crimes inflicted on these brave people five decades ago, or their courageous resistance in the years that have followed.

● Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join my colleagues, the sponsors of this resolution, which commemorates the 50th anniversary of the pandemic famine in the Ukraine.

It is an established fact that this tragedy, which claimed over 7 million lives during 1932 and 1933, was directly attributable to the official policies of the Soviet Union during the worst excesses of the Stalinist era.

The Ukraine has been known traditionally as the breadbasket of Europe, and it is a supreme irony that this region, in particular, should have been the scene of such devastating starvation. While the term "genocide" has been used somewhat indiscriminately in modern times, the mass annihilation of an ethnic population on such a scale, through what can only be described as purposeful neglect, certainly would seem to fit that definition.

Ukrainians are the most numerous of non-Russian elements of the Soviet population and have a distinct cultural and intellectual identity. Ukrainian efforts to preserve their own unique ethnic heritage have been met with resistance and repression by the Soviet authorities—including such measures as deportation to slave labor camps, destruction of churches, religious persecution, and even death.

The Ukrainian yearning for cultural and spiritual freedom is a testament to the human spirit, which still survives amid adversity. It is a spirit—and an inspiration—which Americans especially admire, as they commemorate the inexplicable suffering of an entire nation.●

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, three decades ago, Nikita Khrushchev declared "We will bury you." His comment distills in chilling terms the goal of the Soviet Union. It serves better than any other public statement as an illustration of the thinking of an evil empire bent on imperial conquest and totalitarian domination.

When I hear such such bald statements of intent from our sworn enemies, I am reminded of none other than "Mein Kampf," Adolf Hitler's own blueprint for world conquest. The parliaments of Europe chose to ignore his warnings and we were nearly engulfed by Nazism before we rallied our will and our might to defeat it.

The question we must now ask in this chamber is how many reminders we will need bedore we awaken to the inherent danger of Soviet-brand communism, an atheistic philosophy without regard for human rights, or indeed, for human life itself.

We received a fresh reminder of the despicable barbarism of the Soviet imperialists on September 1, when an unarmed commercial airliner was shot down, snuffing out 269 lives. This atrocity is added to the ringing reminders we have received of late from Afghanistan, from Poland, from Nicaragua, and Cambodia. The cruelties of communism are very much with us.

Today, we offer a reminder of a harrowing event that happened 50 years ago, a forerunner and a harbinger of current atrocities. I speak, of course, of the Ukrainian men, women, and children who were systematically starved by revolutionary butchers in the name of Stalin.

Alexander Motyl, writing in the August 1983, American Spectator, called the Ukrainian catastrophe one of the 20th-century's prime examples of mass destruction. An eyewitness report by Christian Science Monitor correspondent William Henry Chamberlin said that the famine "was not hardship, or privation, or distress, or food shortage, but stark, outright famine, with its victims counted in millions."

But the Ukrainian famine was not only a stark tragedy, it is also an object lesson about the excesses of Soviet-brand communism. For horror of horrors, the Ukrainian famine was not a natural disaster, but a man-made holocaust. in short, it was genocide.

The Ukrainian famine was a deliberate political act by the Bolsheviks. Just as the Nazis resorted to genocide as a tool of conquest, so too did the Soviet Communists turn to mass starvation as a blunt instrument in their ongoing plot to destroy the Ukraine as an independent state and culture.

The independent Ukraine, its fertile wheat fields, its proud peasantry, its deep-felt Eastern Orthodox faith, its language, its literature, and its culture—all stood as an affront to Stalin and his imperialist henchmen. From their hatred and their greed came this despicable and craven act that took the lives of 7 million innocent people.

I have sponsored a resolution (H. Con. Res. 111) which would reflect the sense of Congress that a proclamation should be issued in mournful commemoration of the great famine in the Ukraine in the year 1933. Together with this proclamation would be issued a warning that the continued enslavement of the Ukrainian nation, and other non-Russian nations as well, constitutes a threat to world peace. Finally, my resolution would urge the establishment of a memorial or other official means by which the people of the United States could express their sorrow for the fallen people of the Ukraine, and their support of aspirations for the recovery of their freedom and national independence.

I respectfully urge the passage of this vital resolution. It is time that each and every American reflected on such deeds. It is time we asked what kind of regime would reduce its own bread basket to a barren wasteland. What kind of mentality would liquidate a nation in the name of a Socialist future and destroy a people in the name of progress. We must answer these questions before we can make decisions about the course of America's foreign policy.●

● Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend my colleagues, the Honorable DON RITTER of Pennsylvania and the Honorable GERALD SOLOMON of New York, for scheduling this special order to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the great man-made famine in the Ukraine.

After five decades, the moral and political relevance of the Ukrainian genocide is stronger than ever. We must understand that what the great famine represents to the American people and to people throughout the world, is the barbaric extermination of an independent-spirited people—their culture and their national heritage—for the purpose of extending the political homogeny of a brutal Soviet regime.

The free world has witnessed repeated expressions of the Soviets' commitment to imposing its system of government, ideology, and culture on sovereign states. The subjugation of Eastern Europe and the invasions of Hungary, Czechoslavakia, and Afghanistan are but a few episodes. However, the sheer atrocity of the great famine, in which an average of 10,000 men, women, and children died each day, makes the willful extermination of the Ukrainian people a leading symbol of the Soviets' blatant disregard for basic human rights.

Mr. Speaker, it is no surprise that all 37 members of the Ukrainian Public Group To Promote the Implementation of the Helsinki Accords are either in prisons, labor camps, internal exile, or have been deported by the Soviets for their support for human rights. May we make this commemoration of past atrocities imposed on the Ukrainian people a step toward bringing national attention to the continuing violations of human rights, not only in the Ukraine, but throughout the Soviet Union. We can only hope and pray that someday, these brave men and women will again be free.●

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to join with my colleagues in commemorating the 50th anniversary of the great famine in the Ukraine and express my concern for those people living in the Ukraine who still dream of one day recovering their freedom and national independence.

This anniversary marks a cruel episode in history. At this time I would like to give a brief account of this tragic episode.

On January 22, 1918, Ukraine proclaimed its full and unqualified independence after some 250 years of Russian domination. Despite their initial recognition of this independence the Soviet Government launched an armed aggression against Ukraine, thus initiating the Russo-Ukrainian War, which lasted from 1917 to 1920. Ukraine was conquered and a puppet Communist government was imposed by Moscow on Ukraine.

In 1932 and 1933 the Soviet Union attempted to collectivize all of its agricultural lands. This move met widespread resistance throughout the Soviet Union, especially in Ukraine. The independent-minded Ukrainian people resisted the brutal efforts of the Soviet Union to take over their lands. To break the indomitable will of the Ukrainian people, the Soviets confiscated all wheat and foodstuff and forced famine on the populace. Over 7 million Ukrainians died from this Soviet-enforced famine.

Tragically, because of the Soviet-imposed news blackout and subsequent Soviet efforts to prevent the mention of this famine anywhere, most Americans are unaware of this heinous crime against humanity.

By commemorating the anniversary of the great famine in Ukraine my colleagues and I are honoring the memory of the 7 million victims and the cause they gave their lives for. We are also demonstrating to the people of the Ukraine that we share their desire to become a free and independent nation.

Recognizing the important historical significance of the great famine in the Ukraine of 1933 and the continued enslavement of non-Russian nations inside the Soviet Union, I have cosponsored House Concurrent Resolution 111. This resolution would cite the history and background of the Ukraine famine of 1933, issue a proclamation commemorating this tragedy, issue a warning to the Soviets that their continued enslavement of the Ukrainian nation as well as other non-Russian nations constitutes a threat to world peace and harmonious relations among the peoples of the world. The resolution would also manifest to the captive peoples of the Soviet Union that the United States shares their aspirations for the recovery of their freedom and national independence.

In addition, I have also cosponsored H.R. 3993. This bill would establish a special commission to study the causes and effects of the great famine in the Ukraine in 1933. The commission would meet for 3 to 6 months and its purpose would be to increase people's knowledge of the great famine, document its history for the first time, and foster a better understanding of the Soviet system as it relates to the people of the Ukraine and other non-Russian people inside the Soviet Union.

It is important that we commemorate the anniversary of the great famine in the Ukraine. By doing so we display our great concern and unbending support for all captive nations throughout the world that so courageously seek freedom and self-determination.●

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, less than 1 month ago, the Soviet Union shot down an unarmed passenger airplane with 269 innocent people on board. As Americans, and members of the civilized world, we can never forget this act of coldblooded murder by the Soviets. We can also never forget the Soviets' other acts of atrocity throughout history, such as the invasions of Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Afghanistan; the total control of other Eastern European countries; the persecution of religious beliefs; and the sending of innocent people to forced labor camps. But what may well be the worst act of brutality and violation of human rights by the Soviets is the man-made famine in Ukraine that took the lives of over 7 million Ukrainians.

Today, Congress is recognizing the 50th anniversary of this great famine, one of the most horrifying acts in history, yet one of the least known acts of Soviet communism. This reflection on Soviet morality shows clearly to what lengths they will go to insure their power and what little respect they have for value of human life.

Approximately 10,000 men, women, and children died every day in 1932 and 1933 in history's only man-induced famine in an area called the breadbasket of Europe. It was an effort by the Soviet Government to break the will of the independent minded and nationally conscious Ukrainian people. The Soviets forced all Ukrainian farmers to turn their grain over to the Government, which was then exported or sent to other areas of the Soviet Union. The Government also prevented anyone from bringing food into the Ukraine, nor would they allow the starving to leave. This act of inhumanity was used to insure a Russianized Soviet state, which could then control those whom they viewed as posing a serious threat to the ambitions of the Government.

Sadly, Soviet behavior has not changed in these 50 years and we should not forget that fact. As with the downing of the Korean airliner, the Soviet authorities at first denied their actions, and then after overwhelming evidence to the contrary, the Government defended their terrible deed. On this commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the great famine, and in special recognition to all Ukrainian Americans, we have a duty to remind all Americans that inhumane Soviet behavior has, indeed, not changed in all these 50 years.●

● Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I participate in today's special order commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Great Famine in the Ukraine.

It is an outrage that this artificially created famine, which resulted in the massacre of 7 million Ukrainians, remains until today largely unrecognized. It is insulting to the survivors and a reprehensible blot on our collective conscience.

An act of horror such as this—whether it occurs 5, 50, or 500 years ago, will continue to enforce the influence of its depravity upon us until we, as individuals and as a society, acknowledge, condemn, and learn from it.

As the impact of man's inhumanity to man is perpetuated from generation to generation, and from one people upon another, we must confront ourselves and our history as we ask, "What price silence? What price indifference?" With each technological advance, the potential for horror increases, and the cost to humanity escalates beyond our comprehension.

We must not allow the memory of the anguish and suffering contained in such a tragedy to fade out of our minds, for there are those for whom the pain is seared onto their hearts. This memory is our only shield, our best defense against repetition. Let us resolve together that we will remember those victims of the Great Famine of the Ukraine by exercising constant vigilance—a vigilance that will assure that such a tragedy can never reoccur anywhere on this Earth.●

● Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join today with members of the Ukrainian-American community and with my colleagues in the Congress to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Great Famine in the Ukraine, 1932-33. This famine was different from other famines in history because it was not the result of natural causes—bad weather, poor seed, or drought—but was instead manmade, caused by the Soviet Government which was then firmly in the hands of Joseph Stalin.

An estimated 7 million Ukranian peasants died as a result of Stalin's efforts to collectivize the agricultural economy and to crush the nationally conscious Ukrainian people. We gather here today so as not to forget this infamous famine of genocide.

One scarcely needs an example of Soviet brutality or the Soviet Government's disregard for human dignity, freedom, or even human life. The recent, unconscionable attack on the Korean Air Lines flight 007, still fresh in our minds and in the newspaper headlines, reveals the dangerously paranoid and violent nature of the Soviet Union. Commemoration of the Great Famine serves another purpose, and that is to bring this horrible chapter in Soviet history to light.

As is the usual practice, the Soviets denied the existence of the famine; and the misery in the Ukraine countryside did not receive much attention from the Western press. Around the world the years 1932-33 were grim as nations slid into the Great Depression and fascism rose in Europe. But those years were deadly in the Ukraine. People did not only starve to death, but weakened by hunger, fell prey to a number of diseases—pneumonia, typhus, tuberculosis.

The magnitude of the catastrophe in the Ukraine comes into sharp focus with the statistics on the Soviet population between the years 1926 and 1939. While the total population of the U.S.S.R. increased by 15.7 percent during that period, the population of the Ukraine actually decreased by almost 10 percent over the same period. The population was literally decimated.

We seek here to honor those 7 million people who died 50 years ago, and to express support for Ukrainian-Americans in this country and abroad in their efforts to bring this famine to the attention of all those who seek the truth about the Soviet oppression and violence against the peoples under their domination. We must commemorate the Great Famine and honor the dead so we can know the truth of what really happened and make sure that it never happens again.●

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, once again this body must turn to past events in order to crystallize present situations. Today our thoughts turn to commemoration of the Ukrainian famine of 1933, an artificial famine perpetuated against the Ukrainian people by the Communist domination of Joseph Stalin. I want to thank our colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, DON RITTER, for calling today's special order. Recounting the deaths of so many men, women, and children by starvation in order to export the grain they had harvested, is a clear example that the Soviet Union will go to any lengths, including the decimation of its own citizens, in order to carry out the orders of the Soviet hierarchy.

Because Stalin wanted to insure industrialization, as well as collectivization of the Soviet Union, a conscious plan to deprive the Ukrainian people of the fruits of their labor was carried out. Soon, Stalin knew that his heinous plan was working, since statistics later showed that while the rest of the Soviet populace was increasing, that of the Ukraine decreased dramatically, fully 10 percent within 13 years. In conjunction with this starvation plan was the intent to keep the knowledge of this starvation from becoming known outside the region.

We see parallels today, where the Soviet Union commits an atrocity against 269 innocent passengers of a civilian airliner, yet does not inform its own citizenry of the facts. Such blatant inhumanity must be spoken out against as time and again the Soviet Union shows us its brutal face. The 50th year of commemoration of the famine is the center of legislation, that I cosponsored, House Concurrent Resolution 111, introduced by my colleagues, the gentlemen from New York (Mr. SOLOMON and Mr. FISH). I am pleased that this measure, as well as the special order we are conducting today, are among the reminders the world has of Soviet actions. History does not forget, and the thousands of individuals who will gather on Sunday at the Washington Monument have not forgotten either. This mass rally has been called so that everyone in our Nation can be witness to the commemoration of the unspeakable actions of the Soviet Union 50 years ago. Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to attend that demonstration if they are able, so that together we might speak out against both past and present violations of human rights by the Soviet Union.●

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, 50 years ago the Soviet Union deliberately put to death over 7 million Ukrainians by starvation. This needless slaughter is the only example of manmade famine in history. I join all of my colleagues in abhoring this and other dastardly acts of the Soviet regime.

The Korean airline incident is a timely reminder of the nature of the Soviet regime. Appropriately, there has been much outcry from the incident, yet little attention has ever been paid to the slaughter of Ukrainians in the Soviet Union during the years 1932-33. Stalin used the famine to collectivize Soviet agriculture, to destroy Ukrainian nationalism and independence and to make the Soviet Union into a fully Russian state.

Stalin perpetrated this murder by expropriating all of the foodstuffs of the peasants. Grain was either sold on the international market or sent to other parts of the Soviet Union. The Soviets set up checkpoints to insure that no food entered the Ukraine and that no one left the area.

Fifty years later the world still does not fully realize or comprehend this tragedy, which in magnitude approaches that of the Jewish Holocaust or the Cambodian massacre. Yet we can take the time to remember those who perished at the hands of the Communists on this 50th anniversary of the famine.

Let this anniversary serve as a reminder of the inhumanity of the Stalinist government and of its successors and realize incidents like the Ukrainian holocaust and the murder of 269 innocent people aboard the Korean airliner are, unfortunately, not accidents.

We join Ukrainian Americans throughout our country in grim remembrance on this 50th anniversary of the Ukrainian famine. Our hope is that its recognition will help all of us to work toward the establishment of a world where the preservation of human rights is our highest priority.●

● Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr Speaker, I am proud to join my colleague from New York (Mr. SOLOMON), and many others for this week of September 25 to October 2, 1983, in commemoration of the Ukrainian man-made famine of 1933.

During this incredible famine holocaust, over 7 million Ukrainians were deliberately starved to death by the Soviet Government in an effort to crush Ukrainian nationalism and break down Ukrainian resistance to collectivization.

It is critical that we mark this event now, the 50th anniversary of the famine holocaust. Accounts of the famine, despite eyewitnesses from many countries, are only now beginning to appear in Western publications. As Americans, we must act to inform and educate the millions that know little or nothing of this silent genocide, denied at first by the Soviets and later covered up weakly. We must also take this time to remember the thousands of Ukrainian citizens still in the Ukraine, and countless others throughtout the world still suffering imprisonment and other punishment at the hands of dictatorial governments.

I support House Concurrent Resolution 111 in honor and remembrance of the genocide victims in the Ukraine, and I urge all others to do the same. By helping to disseminate the truth about this almost forgotten tragedy, we will each be performing an outstanding and deserved service for human rights everywhere.●

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to join my colleagues and concerned citizens throughout the world in commemorating the 50th anniversary of the great famine.

In 1932 and 1933, the Soviet Union mercilessly imposed a devastating famine upon the Ukraine. Over 7 million Ukrainians died as a consequence of this cruel and abhorrent act of genocide. This famine, imposed on an innocent people, is reflective of the Soviet Union's total disregard for the value of human life, which is observed even today.

I believe it is fitting, on this anniversary of the suffering and starvation of millions of Ukrainian people, to recognize the ongoing struggle for freedom of our brothers and sisters throughout the world. As free Americans, let us join them in the fight for justice, liberty, and the freedom of all humankind.●

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, this week marks the 50th anniversary of one of the cruelest episodes in Ukrainian history—the great famine. More than 7 million Ukrainians died as a direct result of Stalin's effort to break the will of this proud and independent people.

As the Representative of some 4,000 Ukrainian Americans, the largest population of this ethnic group in New York City, I am well aware that few families have been left untouched by this shameful episode.

The great famine was not a natural disaster. It was a deliberte attempt by the Soviet regime to accomplish, by starvation and disease, what the political process could not achieve.

It is indeed fitting that this House take time out today to make sure that the world does not forget what happened in 1933. Only by remembering injustice and cruelty can we work effectively for freedom and independence.●

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a great honor to rise today to salute the brave Ukrainian people on the 50th anniversary of the great famine. It is most important that this artificially induced famine that killed millions of Ukrainian workers and peasants be remembered as another example of Soviet atrocities against freedom-loving people the world over.

Most Americans are aware of the tragic events that took place in the Ukraine during 1932 and 1933. But the tragedy of the Ukraine really began in 1922, when the Russian Communists brutally snuffed out 4 years of Ukrainian independence by taking control of the Ukraine.

From 1923 to 1930, the Ukrainian people struggled to maintain their ethnic identity and strong feelings of independent nationalism. Despite the efforts of their Soviet rulers, the Ukrainian people were able to make some great strides. The Ukrainian language became the official language of the region and Ukrainian literature flourished. In effect, Ukrainian national culture and identify was at its peak.

But it was in 1932 and 1933 that Stalin utilized food as a weapon to destroy the Ukrainian's quest for freedom and independence. The Ukrainian peasantry was chosen as the principal target for its strong resistance to the Russian's enforced collectivization of agricultural programs. Stalin placed unrealistically high grain quotas on the Ukrainian farmers to produce from areas where fields were mostly unproductive. When the farmers could not meet those quotas, as punishment, he ordered the confiscation of their crops, leaving them facing certain death from hunger.

Entire families were thrown out of their homes and forced to live in fields. Those suspected of stealing food were shot on the spot. While all this was taking place, the Soviets were able to keep the tragic situation a secret from the rest of the world, by barring newsmen from the Ukraine area.

Mr. Speaker, an estimated 8 million Ukrainians died as a result of the Soviet-created famine. It was indeed one of the greatest tragedies in modern history and it was an event that must never be forgotten.

I am a strong supporter of legislation that would establish a special commission to study the causes and the results of the great famine in the Ukraine. This commission would provide the first full accounting of the great famine.

Mr. Speaker, the recent Soviet downing of Korean Air Lines flight 007 is a current reminder that the Russians have not changed their tactics in their relationship with the free world. The deaths of those 269 passengers aboard that flight is a warning to us all that as far as the Soviet Union is concerned, not very much has changed since the murder of millions of Ukrainians during the great famine.●

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, 50 years ago, Ukraine suffered possibly the most devastating manmade famine in history. Six million Ukrainians died as a result of Stalin's order to have Ukrainian-grown food requisitioned to other districts of the Soviet Union.

Stalin's decimation of the Ukrainian peasantry was part of his attempt to completely strip Ukraine of its fragile claim on independence. Yet today, two generations later, Ukraine's sovereign spirit remains very much alive in the minds not only of the 50 million that still reside there, but also among people around the world whose heritage is distinctly Ukrainian.

During this year, the 50th anniversary of the famine, Ukrainian Americans are focusing worldwide attention on this tragedy so that an event of this kind may never happen again. I am proud to recognize their effort, and I hope that their proud and free tradition, shared by so many across the world, can someday be replanted in its own soil.●

● Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the 50th anniversary of the genocidal famine which occurred in the Ukraine from 1932-33. The famine resulted in the death of at least 6 million Ukrainians; 50 years ago, Joseph Stalin announced the collectivization of agriculture, and set out to implement this plan with particular ruthlessness toward the peasant farming communities of the Ukraine. If the peasant had produced only enough for his own subsistence, leaving none for the state, local enforcement under the orders of Stalin, took away their grain, and kept it for state use. In short, all food in the peasant's possession was requisitioned by authorities. Food was available in the cities, but the army and police kept starving peasants from entering them. State agents removed the last sacks of grain from the barns of peasant farmers. Those who resisted the seizure of food were immediately deported to Siberia.

As a result of Stalin's actions, a mass famine came about and in consequence, over 6 million men, women, and children in Ukraine died of hunger.

The famine can be blamed quite flatly on Stalin. The crop in 1932 was about 12 percent below average. This was far from being famine level. But State procurements of food from the peasantry were up by 44 percent. The result was, and could not have been other than, large scale starvation. It is perhaps the only case in history of a purely manmade famine.

It is also the only major famine whose very existence was ignored or denied by the Soviet governmental authorities, and even to a large degree, successfully concealed from world opinion. The Soviet authorities, as far as can be seen, let through only one accidental admission to creating the famine—an accusation that members of the People's Commissariat of Agriculture then on trial for sabotage, had used their positions to "create a famine in the country." The Ukrainian President Petrosky told a Western correspondent that millions were dying. Thirty years later, there was a brief lifting of the curtain in the Soviet press—as in the serial "People are not Angels," by Ivan Stadyuk, who sums up: "The men died first, then the children and finally the women."

I need not underscore the importance in recognizing and remembering the tragedy of this manmade famine which was so successfully concealed from world opinion. It must never be forgotten that one of Stalin's main objectives in the collectivization of agriculture was to crush, destroy, and eliminate the Ukrainian peasantry at any cost.

The tragic saga of the Ukrainian struggle for freedom and human rights has been a continuing testimony to the indomitable spirit of the Ukrainian people. The commemoration of the genocide famine provides a display of faith and nationalism which will be the source of consolation for descendants of the famine victims as well as a source of encouragement to those friends and relatives who still labor under the shadow of communism.

From time immemorial, the human spirit has longed to be free and to be able to take pride in its origins. I sincerely hope that we will all one day see freedom become a reality for Ukrainian people.●

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join with my colleagues, Mr. RITTER and Mr. SOLOMON, in commemorating the 50th anniversary of the great famine in the Ukraine. As a nation that enjoys so many freedoms, America cannot overlook the consequences of oppression and tyranny. It is only fitting that Congress join with the Ukrainian-American community, in honoring the people who 50 years ago fought against Soviet oppression, and that we recognize the struggle against oppression continues throughout the world.

The Soviet actions of 1932 and 1933 are unspeakable. In an attempt to break the spirit and will of the Ukrainian people, the Soviets extracted a larger and larger proportion of Ukrainian harvests, even as farm production was dropping. The result was famine. Soviet attempts at collectivization made this tragic situation even worse. Over 7 million men, women, and children died in the only recorded incident of a manmade famine. Those peasants who attempted to flee the region were ruthlessly turned back. I can think of no more brutal, heartless, and inhuman action than forcing innocent villagers to starve to death while their harvests are being sent to feed Mother Russia.

The rhetoric of the Soviet Union is that the rest of the world is out to destroy Russia. However, the facts of history show otherwise. The Soviet Union killed over 20 million of its own people before World War II. Russia conquered Eastern Europe in the mid 1940's, and has stifled any subsequent attempts by those conquered peoples to obtain freedom. Russia has invaded Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Afghanistan in a ruthless attempt to keep the peoples of these countries shackled in the chains of tyranny. The Soviets have supported "workers' revolutions" in Third World countries, yet they put down the attempt to obtain workers' rights in Poland. In one of their most barbaric actions to date, the Soviets murdered 269 innocent people aboard the Korean Air Lines jetliner.

We must remember the Ukrainian famine, as we must remember these other tragic actions by the Soviet Union. The courage of the Ukrainians, Eastern Europeans, and other oppressed peoples of the past will inspire those people today who are not fortunate enough to live in the land of freedom. As our Eastern European brothers struggle for their freedom today, we must always remember how long their struggle has been. It is important to remember how high a price they have already paid, and continue to pay, even now. We must be inspired by the courage of the Ukrainian people, and continue our resolve to fight oppression anywhere in the world.●

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, today we recognize, commemorate, and mourn the victims of one of history's most horrifying genocides. Fifty years ago, the Soviet regime under Stalin's leadership began an enforced famine in which it is estimated that up to 7 million Ukrainians and Cossacks died under the oppressive wheel of a State policy known as collectivization. Beginning in 1932, the peasantry of the Ukraine was given unreasonably high quotas of crops to be turned over to the State. In order to meet the quotas, the peasants were stripped of all means of self-sufficiency, of food, grain, and seeds. The Soviet Government, in its relentless drive toward power, consolidation, and industrialization, erected watchtowers to insure that humanity remained outside, that no food was taken from the land to feed the starving, and that no one escaped from the Ukraine into the Russian republic.

Left with nothing on which to subsist, the peasants and their families starved. The search for food was in vain. Corpses littering the streets were a daily, gruesome sight. This vicious and calculated government policy of forced famine was further testimony of the tryannical inhumanity of a State that would sacrifice human lives to further its goals. Collectivization proved to be an effective State mechanism for the liquidation en masse of Ukrainian nationalism.

In the face of mounting evidence that a deadly famine existed in Ukraine, the Soviet authorities characteristically denied its existence. It is ironic that the 50th anniversary of the Great Famine should fall during this time of strained relations with the Soviet Union. We should understand that the irresponsible downing of the Korean Air Lines jet is merely the latest addition to a long list of ignoble atrocities committed by the Soviet Union. Let this anniversary focus our attention on putting an end to the destruction of personal liberties, so that we will never again speak of survivors or victims, but only of people.●

● Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, this week we commemorate the victims of the 1932-33 famine in the Ukraine.

The horrible experience of Ukrainians half a century ago is remembered today not as a natural catastrophe that caused the death of thousands, but as an artificial, government-assisted famine which contributed to the deaths of millions.

Ukrainian resistance to the russification of their nation and the forced collectivization of their agriculture were major factors influencing the actions of the Soviet Government in those dark days. While grain harvests declined in the region, the Soviet Government continued to requisition and confiscate Ukrainian grain for export. Meanwhile, millions died of starvation.

The National Committee to Commemorate Genocide Victims in the Ukraine (1932-33) has designated September 25-October 2 as a week to honor those who suffered and died in the famine. In their memory, I would like to share with my colleagues an article which describes the events of 50 years ago, by Mr. Adrian Karatnycky, the research director of the A. Phillip Randolph Institute. The article, which appeared in the July 7, 1983, Wall Street Journal, follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 7, 1983]

FORCED FAMINE IN THE UKRAINE: A HOLOCAUST THE WEST FORGOT

(By Adrian Karatnycky)

Fifty years ago this past spring, the normally bountiful fields of the Ukraine were filled with the odor of death. Crows flew over the steppe, awaiting their feast of human carrion. Corpses littered the streets and roadways. In the June 6, 1933, issue of the London Morning Post, Malcolm Muggeridge depicted the following scene:

"If you go now to the Ukraine or the North Caucasus, exceedingly beautiful countries and formerly amongst the most fertile in the world, you will find them like a desert; fields choked with weeds and neglected; no livestock or horses; villages deserted; peasants famished, often their bodies swollen, unutterably wretched.

"You will discover if you question them that they have had no bread at all for three months past; only potatoes and some millet, and they are now counting potatoes one by one. . . . They will tell you that many have already died of famine and that many are dying every day; that thousands have been shot by the government and hundreds of thousands exiled."

The devastation Mr. Muggeridge described wasn't caused by any natural catastrophe. It was an entirely new phenomenon—history's first artificial famine: a consequence of Stalin's effort to collectivize agriculture and crush the nationally conscious Ukrainian peasantry.

With the exception of Mr. Muggeridge's reports, William Henry Chamberlin's in the Christian Science Monitor, and the publication of several stories and a number of shocking photographs of starving children in the Hearst newspapers, the Western press was largely silent about the genocide that was occurring in the Soviet Ukraine. Europe and the U.S. were in the throes of the Great Depression. Violence in the streets was common. Fascism was on the march. The forced famine of 1933 had regrettably come at an inopportune time.

Some reporters from the West concealed the truth because of an ideological commitment to Soviet communism. Others, like New York Times correspondent Walter Duranty, were seduced by official favors and access to high government circles into deliberately and shamelessly attempting to suppress the story of the famine, while writing fawning articles on Stalin's rule. For this Mr. Duranty was rewarded with Pulitzer prizes and the Order of Lenin.

None of the day's newspaper reports was able to grasp the enormity of the cataclysm. Today, reliable academic estimates place the number of Ukrainian victims of starvation at 4.5 million to 7 million. This dark event, which rivals in its magnitude the Jewish Holocaust and the massacre of the Cambodians by the Khmer Rouge, is still largely unknown outside the private memories of some survivors.

The famine was in part the byproduct of Stalin's relentless drive to collectivize Soviet agriculture. That starvation was artificially induced is beyond dispute. The famine was a clear result of the fact that between 1931 and 1933, while harvests were precipitously declining, Stalin's commissars continued to requisition and confiscate ever-increasing quantities of grain, much of it exported to Western Europe. Peasants were shot and deported as rich, landowning "kulaks." Most livestock perished from the lack of feed, some as a result of peasant attempts to resist collectivization. Cannibalism was not uncommon. Although no medical quarantine was declared and non-Ukrainians were free to travel into and out of the area, starving villagers who sought to flee areas stricken with famine and its resulting outbreaks of pneumonia, typhus, and tuberculosis were turned back at checkpoints controlled by Soviet patrols that scrupulously enforced newly imposed internal passport regulations.

While the drive to collectivize agriculture was a wideranging phenomenon common to the entire U.S.S.R., only in the Ukraine did it assume a genocidal character. Indeed, there can be no question that Stalin used the forced famine as part of a political strategy whose aim was to crush all vestiges of Ukrainian national sentiment. As he wrote, "The nationality problem is by its essence a peasant problem." The attack against the "kulaks," therefore, was viewed as an attack against the social basis of Ukrainian nationalism. Moreover, the famine was accompanied by an extensive purge in the cities of the Ukrainian cultural and political elite—whose leading activists had been the precursors of a national communism similar to that which later emerged in Tito's Yugoslavia and Gomulka's Poland.

Some might ask whether today it is worthwhile to dredge up the memory of yet another act of Stalinist barbarism. What can this event from a dim and receding past tell us that Solzhenitsyn's "Gulag Archipelago" has not? One might be tempted to say that nothing new can be learned from this secret horror. Yet the 1933 famine is important for both moral and political reasons.

There is of course our moral obligation to honor the memory of the nameless victims by depicting the truth. Moreover, it is important to understand the forced famine as a pivotal event in Soviet history, whose consequences remain to this day.

For the famine created a disastrous situation in Soviet agriculture from which the U.S.S.R. still hasn't fully recovered. Moreover, the famine eliminated a substantial segment of the U.S.S.R.'s non-Russian population, thus ensuring that the Soviet Union would remain for the next five decades a state dominated by an absolute Russian majority. Finally, the famine caused an enormous rift within the Ukrainian nation, which has long been nationally assertive. To this day, independent and national sentiment among Eastern Ukrainians is much lower than among Western Ukrainians (who, in 1933, as part of Poland, were spared the trauma of the famine and the Great Terror).

Yet despite the pivotal importance of the forced famine, for 50 years its full story has remained untold. Not one serious book on this tragedy is available in English.

Today—at a time when some would recast Soviet communism in a friendlier mold, the better to negotiate arms reductions with—may once again be an inopportune time to bring up the terrible loss of life and the painful trauma of the brutally scarred Ukrainian nation. Yet 50 years seems too long to remain silent about one of the greatest crimes in mankind's history.●

● Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, even from a distance of half a century, it is impossible to reflect on the unspeakable atrocity of the Ukrainian genocide without feelings of horror and outrage. That the Great Famine of the early 1930's in the Ukraine was manmade, and forcibly imposed on millions of innocent victims, makes the memory even more distressing. The reprehensible actions of the Soviet Government, which sought to bolster its industry at the expense of its agriculture, the sole sustenance of millions of peasants, by brutally collectivizing their farms and expropriating their grain and livestock, served also to crush the spirit of Ukrainian nationalism which was perceived as a threat to government stability. An estimated 7 million men, women, and children died during the famine; most who submitted to the dictates of the government starved to death, while those who resisted were either executed or exiled to hard labor camps, a death sentence in itself.

This appalling genocide went practically unrecognized by the world at large during its length, due in part to the closer-to-home woes of the Great Depression and in part to the refusal of the U.S.S.R. to admit that millions of its citizens were being starved to death. Now, 50 years later, the world should be made aware of the callous and inhumane attitude of the Soviet Union, which caused so much unnecessary suffering and death then and seems to have persisted from the nightmare reign of Stalin into the present day. In commemorating the anniversary of the Ukrainian Famine, we, as a Nation, should ponder more deeply the consequences of allowing unopposed the actions of a government which signed the Helsinki accords, yet continues to display such contempt for human life and the higher principles of morality, freedom, and justice, lest we forget, and in forgetting, leave unobstructed the way for ever more horrifying atrocities.●

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to have this opportunity to make a few remarks in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the famine in the Ukraine; a famine which was planned and orchestrated by the Soviet Union, which resulted in the death of over 7 million Ukrainian men, women, and children, and which has been little noted by the world.

It is this fact of the world's inattention which makes this special order and the special exhibit currently in the Cannon Building so important. For sponsoring these events, we owe a debt of gratitude to our colleagues, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RITTER, and my colleague from New York, Mr. SOLOMON.

It is unfortunate that the Cannon exhibit has not been circulated to every world history class in this country. Entitled "The Soviet Planned Genocide in the Ukraine, 1932–33," the exhibit is on loan from the Ukrainian Research Institute of Harvard University. In just 15 minutes at this exhibit, a viewer gains a vivid picture of this catastrophe of 50 years ago.

Impossible grain quotas were imposed on the Soviet Ukraine by the Soviet Union in an effort to break the will and independence of the Ukrainian people. The result was a famine which killed millions of people. The Harvard exhibit states that, "Beginning in January 1933, the Ukrainian countryside became a vast death camp." At the same time, the Ukrainian Orthodox Church was banned and many of its priests and religious laypersons were executed or died in the Gulag. While the genocide of the Ukrainian people was not well recorded then or now, the New York Evening Journal and a few other papers ran headlines at the time proclaiming, "Soviets Starve Peasants to Death as Punishment," and "Villages Depopulated by Hunger in Ukraine."

The incredible thing is not that so many died in the famine, but that the spirit of the Ukrainian people was not broken. While to this day, the Soviet Union is trying to wipe out the language and culture of the Ukraine, the Ukrainian people continue to resist. I urge my colleagues who have not yet cosponsored House Concurrent Resolution 111, introduced in April by Representative SOLOMON, to do so at this time. This resolution, which commemorates the famine and expresses solidarity with the freedom-loving people of the Soviet Union, and this special order represents a lifeline of hope to the Ukrainian people. Thank you.●

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, ever since the Soviets shot Korean Air Lines flight 007 out of the sky there has been a preponderance of commentary by people of all walks of life and all political persuasions, about the brutal nature of the Soviet Government.

This fact is old news, particularly to the millions of victims of Soviet repression. The murder of 269 innocent people was barbaric, but Soviet history is replete with cowardly acts of violence. Perhaps no clearer example is that of the Soviet-induced famine in the Ukraine 50 years ago, which took the lives of 7 million people.

The figure boggles the mind! For what crime were these victims sentenced to slow but sure death by starvation? Merely for desiring an independent Ukrainian nation. Freedom, in accordance with Soviet paranoia, must be snuffed out at all costs. Therefore, 7 million men, women, and children were forced to watch as their fertile land was raped and ravaged by Soviet authorities, and as their families, friends, and community were immediately wiped out for resisting, or slowly liquidated while trying to survive despite the inhumane suffering imposed upon them.

Little was known of this atrocity 50 years ago. For just as the Soviets attempted to deny shooting down flight 007, they tried to deny their alarmingly effective effort to "russify" the Ukraine. However, the overwhelming evidence in both cases would not permit them to hide cowardly behind the veil of innocence.

Today's special order which commemorates the tragedy of 50 years ago is of the utmost importance and significance. Focusing attention on this grisly deed assures that its millions of victims did not die in vain, while reminding ourselves of its occurrence, forces us to remain aware that the Soviet Union cannot be trusted. The concepts of human rights, dignity, and freedom appear only to exist in the Russian mentality in terms of their violation.●

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join with my colleagues in commemorating the 50th anniversary of the genocidal famine in Ukraine caused by the Communists, who deliberately let almost 8 million men, women, and children starve to death.

In the early 1930's Stalin decided to transform the Soviet Union into a communistic industrial society in the shortest time possible, with absolutely no concern about the cost to human life. Ukraine was especially selected by the Kremlin to be punished for its strong opposition to Stalin's plans which included the collectivization of agriculture. This imposed communism-invoked massive resistance on the part of the brave Ukrainian people, for whom the principles of ownership of private property, self-determination, and freedom, were deeply embedded in their national, social, and religious upbringing.

In an attempt to break this resistance, the Communists resorted to brute force and oppression. Officials in Moscow issued stern decrees calling for the immediate execution by firing squard of those caught gathering wheat from the fields, and the Communist government of the Ukrainian SSR in Kiev extended this severe restriction to apply to the gathering of any crop. Ukrainians soon were dying by the thousands, as the Soviets attempted their "final solution" for terminating notions of Ukrainian independence and sovereignty.

At this point in the RECORD, I would like to include an excerpt from the publication entitled, "50 Years Ago: The Famine Holocaust in Ukraine; Terror and Human Misery as Instruments of Soviet Russian Imperialism," prepared by the World Congress of Free Ukrainians, which includes eyewitness accounts of this Communist atrocity committed against Ukrainians. The excerpt follows:

To implement these inhuman decrees during the harvest of 1932 Moscow dispatched to Ukraine thousands of Communist agents, members of the Comsomol and armed detachments of the Red Army, and the GPU, who indiscriminately confiscated all the grain and food products they could find anywhere. This food, literally a matter of life or death to the Ukrainians, was transported by freight cars to the Russian SFSR and subsequently exported abroad. From the proceeds of its sale, the Kremlin was buying industrial machinery and equipment abroad for the "rapid industrialization" of the USSR.

This barbarous genocidal policy soon led to a shocking and unprecedented famine in Ukraine! The average diet disintegrated to meager rations of potatoes, beets, and pumpkins.

An eyewitness, who is still alive on the North American continent and who was a teen-ager during the man-made famine, stated:

". . . I am a son of a farmer from the once prosperous Poltava region . . . We joined the collective farm when our neighbors did and our land, horses, cows and farm implements were taken away. Three months later we were notified that we had been classified as 'kurkuls' and that we had to vacate our house.

"Before we were hustled out of our home, my father managed to conceal some grain in the leggings of his boots, and we lived on this for a few days in the hamlet. Then came the ordeal of hunger.

"There was no food, and our bodies began to swell. This was at the time when hordes of 'grain collectors' invaded the villages and searched for concealed stores in the ground, in granaries, stables, orchards, fields, even wells.

"My father died on the road near the hamlet, and his body lay there for ten days: nobody buried him, for the dead lay scattered everywhere. My mother could not bury him because she too had become swollen with hunger; her body was covered with sores and she was very weak.

"I don't know where and when my father was buried. After his death, one day my mother and three little sisters joined him . . .

"All of us were small, we could not bury our mother and sisters, and their bodies lay in the house a long, long time. Three other sisters and I were still alive, but we could not walk, only crawl.

"We could crawl thus to our mother and lie beside her. When about two weeks later, our mother's body began to move with a mass of maggots, we managed to roll it onto a ladder and drag it out of the house."

So did the Ukrainians die by the thousands. Despite police blocks, thousands upon thousands were fleeing to the cities in desperate search of food, but finding none, they collapsed and died on the streets of Kiev, Kharkiv, Odessa, and other cities of Ukraine.

From the "breadbasket" which Ukraine still was, starving people began traveling in ever-growing groups to neighboring areas, especially to the Russian SFSR, where there was no famine to speak of!

Macolm Muggeridge, noted British journalist—who is still with us today—traveled in Ukraine at that time. He wrote:

". . . A merciless war is being waged by the Soviet government against the peasants. The battlefield is truly ruined, but the struggle is going on. One can see . . . millions of peasants dying from hunger, and the soldiery of the GPU implementing the orders of the proletarian revolution. They have thrown themselves upon Ukraine as famished vultures. They have executed and deported millions of peasants, sometimes entire villages. Thus they have succeeded in transforming the richest country in the world into a desert, full of melancholy . . ."

The New York Times, reporting in its issue of September 21, 1953 on the Ukrainian "Memorial Manifestation" on the 20th anniversary of the man-made famine in Ukraine, held in New York City, quoted the late Prof. Rafael Lemkin, author of the U.N. Convention against genocide, as saying that the Moscow-instrumented famine in Ukraine in 1932-1933 was a deliberate and political genocide directed against the Ukrainian nation as such.

And, indeed, it was genocidal in its attempt to extirpate a whole people.

This manmade famine was a tragedy of tremendous proportions, as the Communists systematically tried to wipe out the culture and spirit of the Ukrainian people. Although today, hundreds of political prisoners are incarcerated simply because of their desire for freedom, the Soviets have been unable to crush Ukrainian aspirations for a free nation.

As we commemorate this famine, it is also fitting to remind the world about the plight of Yurij Shukhevych, who has been held a prisoner since 1948 because he has continually refused to denounce his late father, the Commander in Chief of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army. Despite his poor health and blindness, Shukhevych remains firm, and stands as a source of inspiration to Ukrainians all over the world. I urge the Soviet authorities to honor their obligations under international law, and immediately release him, and allow him to emigrate so that he may live the rest of his life free from tyranny and oppression.

Mr. Speaker, in commemorating the genocidal Ukrainian famine of 1932-33, it is my privilege to join with Americans of Ukrainian descent in the 11th Congressional District of Illinois which I am honored to represent, and Ukrainian Americans all over this Nation. The sad fate and memory of the innocent victims of Communist aggression will not be forgotten, as the Ukrainian people, and Ukrainian prisoners of conscience, continue in their heroic struggle to achieve freedom and sovereignty for their beloved country. We look forward to the day when democracy will ultimately triumph over tyranny, and Ukraine will once again take its rightful place in the community of free nations.

● Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, today I join with my colleagues in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of one of the most brutal crimes in human history—the Ukrainian famine of the 1930's. An estimated 7 million Ukrainians died in the man-made disaster, but despite its barbarity and its magnitude, the fate of the Ukrainian people under Stalin has often been forgotten by history.

The famine, which swept the Ukraine and other agricultural areas of the Soviet Union, was induced by Stalin's industrialization and collectivization policies, and callously manipulated to crush rural resistance. Starvation and the epidemics which accompanied it were used as a weapon of terror against the peasantry. While men, women, and children starved by the millions in the countryside, grain continued to be transported to the cities and shipped abroad to help finance a massive industrialization program. Soviet leaders refused even to acknowledge the famine's existence, and most of the rest of the world remained unaware of the truth.

But, if we forget this act and allow it to fade into obscurity, we compond its evil. The 7 million victims cannot write their own histories or prevent a recurrence of the crime. For the sake of those who died, and for those who continue today to struggle for human rights under the threat of repression and death, it is up to us to insure that this atrocity is not forgotten.●

● Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Speaker, today we mark the 50th anniversary of the Soviet genocide in the Ukraine. Seven million Ukrainians died in famines and massacres inflicted by the Soviet regime. Millions more from other national groups—Jews, Byelorussians, Russians—also died in this horror, which may have cost up to 10 million lives.

William Butler Yeats wrote that "the ultimate reality of life is the horrible." The 20th century has been an era of genocide and killing. It started in 1915 when the Ottoman Empire first merged the technology of the modern world with the most ancient hatreds in the human soul. The Armenian genocide was where the world we live in now today began. The Ukraine became another step on the path of horror that has stretched across history since then, a path that includes the extermination camps of Hitler's Germany and the autogenocide of Pol Pot's Kampuchea.

The Soviet Government killed those millions of people because it thought it was inconvenient that they be alive. The collectivization of agriculture, in the Soviet views, required the liquidation of those who owned land or livestock. After all, they were "dying classes", because under the laws of Marxist-Leninist economics they were going to die out anyway, just as the Jews were a "dying race" under the equally insane laws of Nazi eugenics.

The Ukrainian genocide was not an aberration, a moment of Stalinist excess, something the Soviet Government regrets in its past. The Soviets do not reject Stalinism. They embrace it as glorious and a guide to future policy. The methods Stalin used in the Ukrainian famine and later in the Great Purge and a whole galaxy of greater and lesser horrors are an integral and intrinsic part of the nature of the Soviet state. They are as unrepentant over the deaths of 7 million Ukrainians 50 years ago as they are over the deaths of 269 people on Korean Air Lines flight 007. To the Soviets, human life is only valuable to the extent that it serves the Soviet state. Lives are basically meaningless. Only the state has meaning and value. Lenin himself wrote: "We must hate—hatred is the basis of communism." The men, women, and children who were killed in the Ukraine were, like the passengers on flight 007, or the Afghans, or the Jewish refuseniks, "class enemies." That is the essence of the Soviet totalitarianism.

When the Ukrainian genocide was going on, there were many who refused to believe in it, who thought that Soviet motives were only of the purest, that these 7 million people were not in any way fit to stand in the way of the march of socialism by the act of staying alive. The story of the Western apologists for Soviet crimes is a very discouraging one. Like the crimes themselves, they did not end in the Ukraine, but go on today. The apologists can do as much damage to freedom as the criminals themselves.

The struggle for human rights in the Ukraine is still going on. In 1976, the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group was founded to watch the human rights situation in the Ukraine. The group found there were no rights to monitor—all of its 37 members are now in prison or exile. Yet this shows that even the Ukrainian genocide and 60 years of Soviet repression have not killed the Ukrainian people's willingness to stand up for freedom and human dignity, whatever the cost. That is what we should remember on this, the 50th anniversary of the Ukrainian genocide.●

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, several million people died of starvation in the Ukraine in 1932 and 1933. The Government of the U.S.S.R., although being fully aware of the famine, failed to take any relief measures. In fact, it is alleged that the Soviet Government was directly responsible for the curtailment of all food to the Ukraine.

The result of this artificial famine, was the destruction of the political, cultural, and national rights of the people of the Ukraine. To commemorate this atrocity, the League of Ukrainian Organizations to Commemorate the Genocide of 1932-33 gathered on May 22, in Phoenix, Ariz. It is important that we remember these events of persecution in our society, in order to guard against their reoccurrence.

On May 28, 1934, my father introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives, 73d Congress, to express the sense of the House that the U.S.S.R. should place "no obstacles in the way of American citizens seeking to send aid in the form of money, foodstuffs, and necessities to the famine-stricken regions of the Ukraine."

The resolution also stated "intercessions have been made at various times by the United States during the course of its history on behalf of citizens of States other than the United States, oppressed or persecuted by their own governments, indicating that it has been traditional policy of the United States to take cognizance of such invasions of human rights and liberties."

Congressman GERALD SOLOMON and I have introduced House Concurrent Resolution 111 to commemorate the Ukrainian famine of 1933. Fifty years after 6 million people died from an artificial famine, the horror still escapes the attention of the general public.

Mr. Speaker, a policy of murder is a blot on the public conscience. It is critical that such a ruthless act not be left unnoticed. The full light of public scrutiny must be cast upon the oppression of the Soviet system.●

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, some 20 or so Members have participated in this special order with me and I thank them and all the members of the Ukrainian American community offer their thanks.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

GOLDEN JUBILEE OF BISHOP JOHN J. DOUGHERTY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO) is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, I had the honor and privilege to be among the many friends and admirers of the Most Reverend John J. Dougherty, auxiliary bishop of Newark, for the celebration of the golden jubilee of his ordination to the priesthood.

For 50 years, Bishop Dougherty has devoted himself to the well-being of his fellow man as a priest of God. I am grateful to him for his good works and his words of wisdom that have served to inspire so many of us and to guide so many of us in our own endeavors. I am honored to call him friend.

The observance of this momentous occasion began with a solemn and moving concelebration of a Mass of thanksgiving in the Cathedral of the Sacred Heart in Newark. The Most Reverend Peter L. Gerety, archbishop of Newark, presided and delivered the homily. Bishop Dougherty was the principal celebrant. Concelebrants were his brother bishops of the State of New Jersey and brother priests of the archdiocese.

That evening, there was a reception and dinner attended by some 1,500 persons honoring Bishop Dougherty and his illustrious career at Seton Hall University, the bishop's alma mater and the institution that he served as president for 10 years. At the dinner, the Most Reverend Joseph A. Francis, a fellow auxiliary bishop, delivered a most eloquent keynote address in which he beautifully captured the essence of this outstanding man as:

Theologian, scholar, university president, this international ambassador of good will, painter, poet, preacher, peacemaker, compassionate friend of the poor and the rich, counsel to those in high places and in lowly estates, comforter of widows, orphans and outcasts—educator and much, much more.

At the dinner, I was singularly pleased to present personally to Bishop Dougherty a warm letter of congratulations from President Reagan.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I would like to include in the RECORD at this point the letter written by the President, the text of Bishop Francis' grand tribute to his brother bishop, and the inspiring jubilee prayer written by Bishop Dougherty for this celebration.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, Sept. 23, 1983.

His Excellency,
Most Reverend JOHN J. DOUGHERTY,
Auxiliary Bishop of Newark, Newark, N.J.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: Nancy and I send our warm congratulations on the Golden Anniversary of your ordination into the priesthood.

There is no higher calling than the solemn purpose to which you have devoted your life—the spiritual needs of your fellowman. For the past half century, you have dedicated yourself to the service of God, and in so doing, you have brought countless souls closer to God.

With our prayers that the good Lord will continue to inspire and guide your ministry in His name. God bless you.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

THE MOST REVEREND JOHN J. DOUGHERTY'S 50TH ANNIVERSARY, KEYNOTE ADDRESS GIVEN BY MOST REVEREND JOSEPH A. FRANCIS, D.D., SVD

Greetings: Bishop Dougherty's invitation to address you tonight has done several remarkable, frightening, enjoyable things to me. What remarkable things? Just to be invited to deliver this talk is remarkable—considering the source of the invitation and the large number of eloquent men and women from whom he could have selected as speaker—what frightening things? When one addresses the friends of Bishop Dougherty at his 50th sacerdotal anniversary banquet—one can actually feel the ears of the world are listening and the eyes of the world are focused on the speaker. What enjoyable things? I have relished every moment since my brother Bishop John asked me to do the honor—and tonight, I hope you will share my joy.

What shall I say about this bishop, this theologian, scholar, university president, this international ambassador of good will, painter, poet, preacher, peacemaker, compassionate friend of the poor and the rich, counsel to those in high places and in lowly estates, comforter of widows, orphans and outcasts—educator and much, much more?

I have known about Bishop Dougherty for many years, I have come to know Bishop Dougherty in the past seven and a half years. I had, for many years, loved what he said as a radio and television personality and preacher—as a writer and a scholar. I have admired and been motivated by what he accomplished in his efforts on behalf of peace and justice—but in the past seven and a half years I have learned to love not merely what he has said and done—I have learned to love the man John Dougherty.

During the past several weeks as this talk was bubbling inside of me—struggling to get on paper—I thought of so many impressive things I would say—scholarly things that would beguile this audience. But the closer I came to putting pen to paper—the more I was confronted with the visage of John Dougherty hovering over me, reminding me gently and saying to me: "Now remember Joe, my boy (I allow him to call me boy) less is often more. And if I had my choice between more or less of what you have to say—I would take less." Hence, I looked for less in order to say more. But where could I find a composite of the man—a composite stripped of shame and touching up—a composite that bared the soul of this priest of fifty years—this man—this lover? I remembered that one of my mentors once told me that the soul of a person is most easily and accurately discovered and viewed in a persons thoughts. Thoughts exposed in stone, on canvas, in song, in musical compositions, in essays, speeches, poems—prayers—yes, prayers. The most accessible thought of Bishop Dougherty available to me was in a prayer. I have prayed this prayer many times. The auxiliary bishops pray it before all of their meetings. And so I turned to the prayer to catch a glimpse of the soul of the person in whose honor we are gathered this evening.

I began to understand how he could be like so many of the beloved men and women of the bible—wrestling with God like Jacob—wrestling to know God in the mysterious—ever evolving and revealing story of the Bible—leading his people like Moses even and especially when they were stubborn and reluctant to follow—standing like a small David against the Goliaths in Government, in the private sector and even in the church—because he believed so firmly in truth, justice, liberty and peace.

How so much like Job, my friend has been in the past several years when the hand of God touched him with illness. Of all the sermons you have preached, John: of all the speeches you have ever delivered: of all the learning you have shared with your students: of all the witness you have ever given—your lost eloquent sermon, your most profound speech: your most important lesson and your most authentic witness has been the sermon, the speech, the lesson, the witness you gave us by the manner in which you modeled for us a suffering, redeeming Christ. You could have, you must have cried out with Job.

"This I know: That my Redeemer lives and He, at last will take His stand on Earth.

"After my awakening he will set me close to Him, and from my flesh I shall look to God.

"He whom I shall see will take my part: These eyes will gaze on Him and find Him not aloof."—Job, 19:25–28.

I see John proclaiming with Mary his praise of the Lord—who has done great things to Him, through Him and with Him. Like Joseph—the foster-father—never the real Father, never being the real father of his own diocese—yet exercising a loyalty and commitment to his archbishops and serving his people in exceptional and marvelous ways.

Like St. Paul—preaching Jesus Christ crucified—in season and out of season—like St. John who understood all about loving people equaling loving God.

The following episode is but a pradigm a parable of what our jubilarian is really like—it is a glimmer of his soul—peeping out of his prayer—the window of that soul.

Bishop John Dougherty customarily greeted his people after services and often before services. On one occasion, a mother came bounding up the stairs with a five year old girl matching her step for step and bound for bound. There were laughter and merriment in the eyes of mother and child—something which is difficult for most of us to ignore and absolutely impossible for John Dougherty. So, as the couple approached John, he shouted—as only John can shout with dignity: "Hello, my dears—how are you today?" the little girl shouted back as only little girls with laughing eyes can shout: "Hi Jesus" if the mother was shocked, she didn't show it, her eyes didn't show it. They continued to laugh and smile, John's eyes did an Irish jig and he was obviously delighted. He had to know this perceptive child was obviously recognizant to character when she saw it. So John presed on. "What is your name, dearie?" he asked. "Nancy, Jesus; like Nancy with the laughing eyes," "Huh," responded John. For some strange, but explainable reason, as I shall soon explain, this episode repeated itself for almost three weeks in a row. In the fourth week, the young mother stopped short of the church, knelt beside Nancy and admonished her. "Look dear," she said solemnly, but ever so kindly, "We are going into God's house and Jesus is there, but the very kind and charming man who greets us whenever we come to church is not Jesus, he is a priest, a bishop and his name is Bishop John Dougherty, not Jesus." Nancy with the laughing eyes, said: "Yes mom, I know he is not Jesus, but he sure likes to hear me call him Jesus."

Yes, Nancy, like so many of us, had caught a glimpse of the soul of our honoree. She saw something which I found in his prayer. She recognized the Bishop, who is shepherd, she saw someone who has tried for so long, so well, has tried to heal the sheep who are wounded, who has again and again touched the sheep in pain, who at great personal involvment and with such care cleansed the sheep who were soiled and unattractive, who by his compassion and his love for others warmed the sheep who were cold.

Nancy, like those of us who know Bishop Dougherty, recognized in some small childish way the Father's love, through John the shepherd, because the spirit of the Lord is upon him. He had been called and responded so well to that call, that call so well articulated by the prophet Isaiah.

"Thus says God, Yahweh, he who created the heavens and spread them out,

Who gave shape to the Earth and what comes from it,

Who gave breath to its people and life to the creatures that move in it:

I Yaweh, have called you to serve the cause of right:

I have taken you by the hand and formed you:

I have appointed you as covenant of the people and light of the nations, to open the eyes of the blind, to free captives from prison and those who live in darkness from the dungeon."

Did Nancy with the laughing eyes really see all this? Maybe not, but all she had to see was the Jesus in John Dougherty, and surely that was not too difficult an image to bring into focus, not for Nancy, not for any of us.

A few weeks ago, I was doing what I am doing with a lot more frequency, studying the life and times and sayings of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. A friend of mine, a black sister by the name of Sister Roger Thibodeaux, from my home diocese, sent me a well worn and well read paperback entitled "The Wisdom of Martin Luther King in His Own Words." There are just two endorsements on the second page of the book. One is from the New York Times and the other which reads:

"May his spirit rise to haunt the hearts and minds of all Americans until we have won the victory for which he gave his life," signed by Auxiliary Bishop John J. Dougherty.

Yes, John J. Dougherty has been, is and will always be a part of our struggle, seeking to be victorious in the struggle for which Martin Luther King, Jr., gave his life, and Jesus before that and for which thousands of men and women, yes, even children gave their lives, not simply by dying, but by living and being prepared to die for the love of Jesus and Jesus' brothers and sisters.

The very last selection in the book is Martin Luther King's eulogy, written by himself. I want to quote that eulogy, because it helps me, at least, to grasp more fully the image of John's soul, which I have tried to share with you. In that self-articulated eulogy Martin Luther King, Jr., is saying what I said John would say: "Joe, my boy 'less is more.'"

"Every now and then I guess we all think realistically about that day when we will be victimized with what is life's final common denominator, that something we call death.

"We all think about it and every now and then I think about my own death and I think about my own funeral. And I don't think about it in a morbid sense. And every now and then I ask myself what it is that I would want said and I leave the word to you this morning.

"If any of you are around when I have to meet my day, I don't want a long funeral.

"And if you get somebody to deliver the eulogy tell him not to talk too long.

"And every now and then I wonder what I want him to say.

"Tell him not to mention that I have a Nobel Peace Prize, that isn't important.

"Tell him not to mention that I have 300 or 400 other awards, that's not important. Tell him not to mention where I went to school.

"I'd like somebody to mention that day that Martin Luther King, Jr., tried to give his life serving others.

"I'd like for somebody to say that day that Martin Luther King, Jr., tried to love somebody.

"I want you to say that day that I tried to be right and to walk with them. I want you to be able to say that day that I did try to feed the hungry. I want you to be able to say that day that I did try in my life to clothe the naked. I want you to say on that day that I did try in my life to visit those who were in prison.

"And I want you to say that I tried to love and serve humanity.

"Yes, if you want to, say that I was a drum major. Say that I was drum major for justice. Say that I was a drum major for peace. I was a drum major for righteousness.

"And all of the other shallow things will not matter. I won't have any money to leave behind. But I just want to leave a committed life behind. And that is all I want to say. If I can help somebody as I pass along, if I can cheer somebody with a well song, if I can show somebody he's traveling wrong, then my living will not be in vain."

Yes, my friends, yes John, I didn't go into an enumeration of all the great deeds you have done, all the honors you have received, the names of the schools you attended, the brilliant leadership you have exercised in national and international enterprises, the learned societies to which you belong. I only want to say that you are indeed, a drum major for the Lord, a drum major for peace, for racial equality, for all those who need a voice to amplify their cries for help, for recognition, for love and understanding. I only want to remind all of us and in so doing thank you for helping us to know the Father's love through Jesus the Shepherd and through the spirit in helping us to build love on justice and justice on love. In encouraging us, in challenging us, in leading us to believe mightily, to hope joyfully, to love divinely.

And so tonight, we offer you what is only ours to give, it's the most precious thing we can offer, we give you our love!

JUBILEE PRAYER

May my prayer rise
Like incense
With the fragrance of thanksgiving,

For Thee Jesus through whom I have known the Father,
For the Spirit
Gift of the Father and the Son,
For the Eucharist and Holy Orders;
For brother sun
And sister moon
And gentle rain,
For lilies of the field
And birds of the air,
For family and friends and little children
Companions of the pilgrimage;
For illness and healing,
For teachers and books and students
And strange and distant places.
And O my God

GENOCIDE VICTIMS IN THE UKRAINE, 1933

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. ADDABBO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, just over 50 years ago, the Soviet Union embarked upon a brutal policy of collectivization in an effort to unite the peasant countryside under the Soviet regime.

In the Ukraine, this policy meant deliberate genocide through manmade famine. The horrifying deaths of as many as 7 million Ukrainians, during this time, raises a terrible specter the world is reluctant to acknowledge or recall.

Disaster on such a scale is always difficult to comprehend, but we must do just that, for only that way can we guard against its recurrence. While the Soviets extracted grain from the area at a preposterously high rate that remained constant, despite drastic declines in the land's fertility, the Western World, incredibly, remained largely oblivious to the mass starvation and disease destroying the Ukrainian people.

The West closed its eyes to the pictures painted in excruciating detail by the few Western jounalists able to break through the lies of Soviet authorities and see for themselves the horror of an area gripped by famine.

It is our responsibility now, when the facts of this case can no longer be hidden, to let those facts be known. Fifty years later, we must recall those millions of nameless victims in such a way as to give meaning to otherwise meaningless deaths. We must understand this tradegy in its enormity, and denounce the capability of man to unleash such inhumanity against man.●

NATIONAL VETERANS SERVICE OFFICE PROGRAM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation to assist our Nation's veterans in obtaining their rightful benefits. My bill would establish a grant program to assist State governments in providing veterans with advice and assistance concerning State and Federal veterans programs and benefits.

As Members of this body know only too well, congressional offices today shoulder an awesome responsibility in assisting constitutents in their day-to-day dealings with agencies of the Federal Government. We are all familiar with lost social security checks and relatives seeking entrance visas. The same applies to veterans and their dependents applying for benefits or enrolling in programs administered by the Veterans' Administration.

Such constituent services have become a vital function of every congressional office and have greatly improved the popular perception of government in general. At the same time, considerable expertise is required to advise veterans on the complexities of VA programs and to offer counsel in preparing or appealing claims. One is left with the impression, moreover, that there are literally hundreds, if not thousands, of veterans in every congressional district who are altogether unaware of services and benefits they may have earned, based on their military service.

In recent discussions with veterans' officials in my home district, it was stated time and again that benefits are continually denied because of poorly prepared claims. Outreach efforts by the Veterans' Administration to alert veterans to regulation changes or new programs are simply too limited to satisfy the present need. It should also be kept in mind that as the average age of veterans continues to increase, greater numbers of veterans will become eligible for "nonservice" benefits, such as the VA disability pension program.

My home State of California is one of but a handful of States to offer veterans, through a network of county veterans' service offices, advice and assistance concerning veterans programs. County offices around the State are open to advise veterans of benefits for which they may be eligible and to assist in preparing or appealing claims. Serving as an advocacy agency, county veterans service offices offer hope to veterans in approaching the formidable bureaucracy of the Veterans Administration which has discouraged many legitimate claims.

Despite recent reductions in State funding, the results of California's program have been dramatic: Veterans, long disenchanted with the Veterans Administration, have found new hope in seeking medical care and other services they have rightfully earned. Moreover, county offices work closely with local veterans' service organizations in providing a broad range of services—including job information and counseling—outside those sponsored by the Veterans' Administration.

Mr. Speaker, it is time that we expand upon the example of my home State and pool all available resources in counseling veterans concerning the myriad of ever-changing laws and regulations affecting their lives.

Accordingly, I am today introducing legislation which would provide a 3-year authorization for matching Federal funds to assist States in providing these needed services. Under my plan matching funds would begin with an 80–20 (Federal-State) contribution decreasing to a 50–50 match after 3 years. The higher Federal contribution in the early years would encourage those States presently lacking veterans service programs to offer such services, while assisting the other States in strengthening existing programs.

To be eligible for matching funds under the program I propose, State governments would be required to submit a grant request to the Veterans' Administration. Such a request would have to include a detailed description of services to be offered and plans for coordinating efforts with local veterans' service organizations. In keeping with the California model, the actual delivery of services to veterans under the program would be managed at the local level, tailored to local needs and resources.

Mr. Speaker, we as a Nation owe a special debt of gratitude to the men and women who have served in our defense. The many veterans programs enacted by Congress underscore the strength and depth of this unique commitment. It is time that we move forward to ensure that veterans receive all the benefits to which they are entitled by law, and which they so justly deserve.

I urge all my colleagues to join me in supporting this timely legislation.

The text of my bill is as follows:

H.R. 4016

A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to establish a grant program to provide assistance to States in providing veterans with advice and assistance concerning veterans benefits

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 3 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section.

"§ 247. Assistance to States in providing veterans information and assistance services

"(a) The Administrator shall establish a program to provide assistance to State governments in providing funding for programs of veterans services established by a State (or by units of local self-government of the State) for the purpose of advising and assisting veterans in matters concerning veterans benefits.

"(b) (1) Assistance under this section shall be provided by grants made after submission to the Administrator of an application for such a grant. Any such application shall describe the State's existing program of veterans services (or describe the State's proposal for a program of veterans' services) for which the grant assistance is requested, shall specify the amount of grant assistance requested, and shall be in such form and contain such additional information as the Administrator may require. The application shall also include a plan for coordination of the State veterans services assistance program with the activities and programs of local veterans service organizations.

"(2) The state plan included in the application must show to the satisfaction of the Administrator—

"(A) that the actual delivery of services to veterans under the program will be managed at the local level;

"(B) that local authorities will determine the details of the advice and assistance to be provided to veterans under the State program; and

"(C) that local authorities will assume a portion of the costs of the administration of the program.

"(c) A condition of approval of a grant under this section shall be that—

"(1) during the first fiscal year for which funds are available for grants under this section, the State to which the grant is made must match the grant by an amount equal to one-fourth of the grant;

"(2) during the second fiscal year for which funds are available for grants under this section, the State to which the grant is made must match the grant by an amount equal to one-half of the grant; and

"(3) during the third and subsequent fiscal years for which funds are available for grants under this section, the State to which the grant is made must match the grant by an amount equal to the amount of the grant.

"(d) The Administrator shall prescribe regulations to be used in evaluating applications for grants under this section and to be used in the administration of the program established by this section.

"(e) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Veterans' Administration for grants under this section the sum of $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1984, $8,000,000 for fiscal year 1985, and $6,000,000 for fiscal year 1986.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of such chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"247. Assistance to States in providing veterans information and assistance services.".●

MAJOR DROUGHT RELIEF PROGRAMS CURRENTLY AUTHORIZED BY LAW

(Mr. JONES of Tennessee asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues in the House know, our farmers in 1983 have experienced the worst drought since the Dust Bowl. Probably about 2,000 agricultural counties have been impacted and at least half have serious losses.

Secretary John Block called a special meeting in Chicago Labor Day weekend to announce that the administration would take no extraordinary steps to address this problem. Last week the Secretary relayed that same message to the Agricultural Committees of the House and Senate.

At both meetings, I urged the Secretary to use his discretionary authority to help drought-stricken farmers. Some of my colleagues have introduced various legislative solutions but without administration support it appears it would be a wasted effort to proceed legislatively.

Under the circumstances I am asking my colleagues to contact President Reagan and Secretary Block and urge them to make appropriate use of existing authorities.

For your use here is a list of those emergency authorities and their status as far as I can tell:

MAJOR DROUGHT RELIEF PROGRAMS CURRENTLY AUTHORIZED BY LAW

(1) FmHA Emergency Disaster Loan Program.—Production loss loans available to farmers having 30 percent loss of production due to disaster, in amount equal to 80 percent of actual loss, at interest of 8 percent for those unable to obtain credit elsewhere and market rates for the creditworthy.

Status.—As administered, loans available only in designated disaster counties. (GAO and Committee believe Act makes loans available to farmers meeting eligibility standards without regard to county designation; H.R. 1190, passed by House and pending in Senate, makes this clear). As of September 15, designations requested for 964 counties; Secretary has designated 121 counties.

(2) CCC Disaster Payment Program.—Payments authorized to producers of wheat, feedgrains, cotton and rice who participate in acreage limitation or set-aside programs if Secretary finds the producers have, due to disaster, suffered substantial production losses creating an economic emergency and that crop insurance either is not available or is insufficient to meet emergency.

Status.—Program has not been implemented.

(3) Grazing and Haying of Conservation-Use Acreage.—Secretary authorized to allow grazing or haying of wheat, feedgrains, cotton and rice acreage retired from production under certain circumstances.

Status.—Program has been implemented in numerous areas.

(4) Crop Insurance.—Expanded crop insurance coverage available under 1980 amendments to Crop Insurance Act, though participation by farmers is low. No assistance available to those who did not acquire insurance prior to drought loss.

Status.—Program has been implemented.

(5) CCC Emergency Feed Program.—Secretary authorized to reimburse livestock and poultry producers for up to 50% of cost of feed purchased commercially if producers, because of disasters, have suffered substantial loss in feed production, lack adequate feed, and must, therefore, make larger than normal feed purchases.

Status.—Program has not been implemented.

(6) CCC Livestock Feed Program.—CCC is authorized to (1) donate its commodities to relieve distress in areas where Presidentially declared disaster exists (rarely done in case of drought); (2) make its feed available at reduced prices to those who, in areas where disaster emergency exists, do not have and cannot obtain without financial hardship sufficient feed for cattle; or provide for feed dealers to make feed available to such persons with CCC replacing with any feed it owns; and (3) purchase feed for disposition in connection with any emergency determined by the Secretary to warrant assistance. (While PIK has depleted regular CCC stocks, a 75 million bushel disaster reserve is authorized.) Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) has similar authority.

Status.—Program has not been implemented.

(7) Small Business Administration Loans.—Through September 30, 1983, SBA Physical Disaster loans are available to farmers only if they are refused FmHA disaster loans. Unless legislation is enacted by that date, farmers will again become eligible for such loans on October 1.

Status.—As practical matter, program not now available to farmers.

(8) FmHA Economic Emergency (EE) Loans.—While technically not disaster assistance, EE loan program designed for farmers unable to obtain credit elsewhere due to economic stress, which could be attributable to drought. Interest rate on insured loans not to exceed cost of money plus one percent. For fiscal 1983, guaranteed EE loans are authorized (though Administration disagrees). U.S. District Court has held Secretary's refusal to implement program for fiscal 1982 was arbitrary, capricious, and abuse of discretion, and has indicated it will order Secretary to make insured and guaranteed loans available in the amount of $600 million which he failed to make available in Fiscal 1982.

Status.—Program has not been implemented.●

MILITARILY CRITICAL TECHNOLOGIES

SEC. 109. Section 5(d) of the Act (50 U.S.C. App. 2404(d)) is amended by striking out paragraphs (4) through (6) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(4)(A) The Secretary and the Secretary of Defense shall complete the integration of the list of militarily critical technologies into the commodity control list not later than April 1, 1985. The integration of the list of militarily critical technologies into the commodity control list shall be completed with all deliberate speed, and the Secretary and the Secretary of Defense shall report to the appropriate committees of the Congress, before April 1, 1985, any circumstances which would preclude the completion of the integrated list by that date. Any disagreement between the Secretary and the Secretary of Defense as to whether a good or technology on the list of militarily critical technologies should be integrated into the commodity control list shall be resolved by the President not later than November 1, 1984. Such integrated list shall include only a good or technology with respect to which the Secretary finds that countries to which exports are controlled under this section do not possess that good or technology, or a functionally equivalent good or technology, and the good or technology or functionally equivalent good or technology is not available in fact to such a country from sources outside the United States in sufficient quantity and of comparable quality so that the requirement of a validated license for the export of such good or technology is or would be ineffective in achieving the purpose set forth in subsection (a) of this section, except in the case of a determination of the President with respect to goods or technology under subsection (f)(1) of this section. The Secretary and the Secretary of Defense shall jointly submit a report to the Congress, not later than April 1, 1985, on actions taken to carry out this subparagraph.

"(B) The General Accounting Office shall evaluate the efforts of the Secretary and the Secretary of Defense to integrate the list of militarily critical technologies into the commodity control list, and the feasibility of such integration. In conducting such evaluation, the General Accounting Office shall determine whether foreign availability was used as a criterion in developing the commodity control list pursuant to subparagraph (A) and whether the completed list reflected the intent of the Congress in enacting this subsection. In conducting such evaluation, the General Accounting Office shall have access to all information relating to the list of militarily critical technologies. Not later than April 1, 1985, the General Accounting Office shall submit a detailed report to the Congress on the results of the evaluation conducted pursuant to this subparagraph.

"(C) The Secretary and the Secretary of Defense, in integrating the list of militarily critical technologies into the commodity control list pursuant to subparagraph (A), shall consider mechanisms to reduce the list of militarily critical technologies.

"(5) The Secretary of Defense shall establish a procedure for reviewing the goods and technology on the list of militarily critical technologies at least annually after the integrated list is completed pursuant to paragraph (4)(A), for the purpose of removing from the list of militarily critical technologies any goods or technology that are no longer militarily critical. The Secretary of Defense may, after the integrated list is so completed, add to the list of militarily critical technologies any good or technology that the Secretary of Defense determines is militarily critical. If the Secretary and the Secretary of Defense disagree as to whether any change in the list of militarily critical technologies by the addition or removal of a good or technology should also be made in the commodity control list, the President shall resolve the disagreement not later than three months after the change is made in the list of militarily critical technologies.

"(6) The Secretary of Defense shall, not later than April 1, 1985, report to the appropriate committees of the Congress on efforts by the Department of Defense to assess the impact that the transfer of goods or technology on the list of militarily critical technologies to countries to which exports are controlled under this section has had or will have on the military capabilities of those countries.".

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

REDRESS FOR AMERICANS OF JAPANESE ORIGIN WHO WERE INTERNED DURING WORLD WAR II

HON. DAN MARRIOTT

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. MARRIOTT. Mr. Speaker, the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians has released their recommendation for the steps the United States must take to correct one of the darkest moments of our Nation's history. Prejudice, war hysteria, and a lack of political courage resulted in the internment of 120,000 Japanese Americans in isolated camps during World War II.

I supported the establishment of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians so that Americans would be made aware of and remember this black mark in our Nation's past. Many people from even my generation do not know the extent of the injustices that occurred, and our children are not even aware of the injustices. It is imperative that the American people be educated as to the dangers of unbridled public rage indiscriminately directed at one sector of our population.

Additionally, it is important to note that my colleagues, Representative NORMAN MINETA and Representative BOB MATSUI along with Majority Leader JIM WRIGHT will be introducing legislation in the coming weeks which will offer redress to the many Americans of Japanese origin that were personally affected by this relocation—both in their personal and business lives. I have asked to be an original cosponsor of this legislation and look forward to its passage in the second session of the 98th Congress.

In the meantime, I have met with the Utah Japanese American Citizen League and have personally talked with many of the individuals who were interned and/or evacuated under the exclusionary order implementing Executive Order 9066. At my request, these individuals have submitted personal testimonies on their individual tragedies. I submit a selected few of these recountings which specifically address some of the key questions involved in this matter of reparation and justice.

The Commission on Wartime Relocation and Settlement of Civilians came to the following conclusion:

The promulgation of Executive Order 9066 was not justified by military necessity and the decision which followed it—detention, ending detention, ending exclusions—were not driven by analysis of military conditions.

By submitting some of the personal testimonies from those who were affected by this black period in our Nation's history, I hope that my colleagues will join me in recognizing the harm done to these Americans, and in recognizing that reparation should be granted to all those who were in the custody of Wartime Relocation Authority.

The material follows:

TESTIMONY OF MRS. MAY WATANABE

My name is May Watanabe. I reside at 560 Bothwell Street, Salt Lake City, Utah, 84104, with my husband. My son, Byron, who was only 11½ months old at the time we were evacuated from Los Angeles, is now married and lives at 352 Georgia Circle, Salt Lake City, Utah 84115. He is the father of three children, two sons and one daughter. The oldest child is now eighteen years old and the youngest is now thirteen.

The topic of my discussion is the evacuation in 1942 and of some of the events that happened to our family—my husband, my very young son and me. The war began on December 7, 1941, and it was the first part of 1942 when we were told that President Roosevelt had signed a proclamation to have all of the Japanese and Japanese-Americans residing in the West Coast States to be evacuated from their homes and incarcerated in camps for "safety sake of the country" and that the time was short and they (the government) would not be able to determine which of the Japanese could or could not be trusted. Eventually a notice came out that we would all be sent to camps on April 28, 1942.

This order then gave Roy and I only a part of January, February, March and the few weeks in April to settle all our business and personal affairs and do the best we could before we were sent to camp. On April 28th, we were all herded into buses and taken to our destination with only our three suitcases of clothing and personal goods with us. Since there were three of us—my husband, my young son and myself—we were allowed to take nine suitcases of clothing and treasured things from among all our personal properties which included our home and furnishings, our car, leases and inventories of three flourishing floral shops, and six new delivery vans. We had to settle the rest of our personal properties that we could not take with us. Not knowing how long we were to be incarcerated, we tried to get rid of everything we could. We had no place to store them.

And, as you know, if someone has to leave under government orders, who is going to come in and pay the correct price—the price that is the fair market value? I would like to cite an example. We had just remodeled one of our stores and we had spent a fortune on the building although we didn't own the building since my husband was born in Japan and could not buy property by California law even though he had been a long-time tax paying resident. Also, he could not, by law, become a naturalized citizen. Even though we didn't own the buildings to the floral shops, we had good leases on them. Our investments were all on the inside of these shops, and had we known what was going to happen, we wouldn't have done all of the extensive remodeling.

Additionally, we had just purchased six brand new Dodge 3/4 ton panel trucks to use for deliveries. We paid $800.00 each for the trucks—that's a total of $4800.00 for trucks alone, yet we couldn't sell them until just before we were to go to camp. People held back until we were desperate. Then we were offered $100.00 for each of the trucks. That was a total of $600.00 for all six trucks which didn't even cover the price we had paid for just one new one. We were forced to take the offer since we had no place to keep them and we could not take them with us. And that's the way it was. It was panic—a time of terrible panic.

Another example of how desperate we were is the brand new stove which I had purchased a few months before the war broke out. All I got was $5.00 for it. Someone came up to me and offered to give me $5.00 just to take it away for me. And, of course, I had to take it—what else could anyone do? We gave away most of our things although we had tried to sell whatever we could, but no one was willing to pay us. It was time of terrible panic—we had so little time and we had so much to settle, especially since we didn't know how long we were going to be held at camp or if we would ever be allowed to come back.

We tried to sell our leases to the floral shops. One of our leases was in the well known Farmers' Market. We were one of the thirteen original stores there and were thought of very highly at that time. Although some of the businesses didn't make it, we stayed through the hard times and the business was beginning to improve. Then when the war started, the Farmers' Market asked us to leave because the customers objected to seeing Japanese faces. Although I have a Japanese face, I am an American, a Japanese-American, and no one could have been more loyal to the United States.

I was born in San Francisco and graduated from high school there. My parents were from Japan. Just like so many other Americans, including those of you in Congress, my parents came from another country, but our family all had Japanese faces. After high school, I entered college in Los Angeles and left college when I got married to Roy in Los Angeles. My husband came over from Japan as a young man to live with his parents who were already in America. Roy was a florist and owner of a floral shop at the time we were married. Even then, as I feel now, I was a loyal American. I knew nothing about the politics of Japan. Today, perhaps because of my experience, it is a matter of personal choice to me to buy things made in America.

As I indicated, we tried to sell our stores, the leases and our inventories. The landlords who held the leases were good to us except for the Farmers' Market. An attorney held the lease to one of our shops, the Melrose Shop, and Mr. Harly J. Earle, Vice President for General Motors, held the lease to the Melvine Shop, which was our big one. These landlords held onto our leases until we had to leave. At the beginning of April 1942, we finally sold one shop for $500.00 and the other one for $600.00. All three shops were worth over $150,000.00 at that time. That was our investment. Plus that, we had our clientele which consisted of many Hollywood stars and movie producers. We lost very few customers even during the trying days. Most of them believed in us and stuck by us. Our clientele also included other studio people as well as well known and prestigious families such as the Summermeirs and the Caudells. We had a wonderful clientele. Errol Flynn was one of our steady customers and he remembered us while we were in camp and sent us remembrances from time to time. Our attorney would also drive to the camp to bring us some of his treasured items.

We even had an English "Nanny" for our young son since my husband and I both worked at the floral shops. She had worked for us several months prior to the war and had become deeply attached to Byron. She wanted to keep him with her while we were in camp, but the attorney could not get permission. The government wanted all of the Japanese interned even though my son was only 11½ months old and could not have been disloyal had he wanted to be. This woman had come to us a bit frightened about living and working for a Japanese family, but she found us no different than any other American family. Her offer to keep Byron was sincere and greatly appreciated during those times. She, like us, could not understand why the government had to herd us all into camps, especially little children.

We were taken by bus directly to camp, which was the Manzanar one located near the border of California and Nevada. When we arrived at the camp site, we were taken to the barracks. The buildings were in terrible shape. We could see air spaces between the floors and the walls while the wind and desert sand constantly blew through these crevices. And underneath the building were snakes—and even if they were considered harmless they were frightening. When we were shown our beds, they turned out to be rusty old cots from the World War I surplus. We were each given old musty Army blankets with moth holes. For those who did not bring coats with them, the Army issued them smelly worn-out pea coats that came from the World War I surplus.

In spite of the desolation surrounding Manzanar, many of the internees worked to make the buildings more habitable and also made the desert bloom with gardens and flowers. Gradually, the camp became a more pleasant place to stay. When we got to the camp, there were bugs and spiders everywhere. We were even forced to make our own mattresses. How would you feel to be taken out from your homes and made to endure these hardships just because your ancestors came from a country where your face characterizes your heritage? You are an American citizen, but because you have darker skin, black hair and slanted eyes, these were reasons enough to put you behind barbed wires indefinitely.

We, Roy and I, had paid plenty of taxes and abided by the laws, yet the color of our skin, the fold of our eyes and our ancestry were reasons to put us into prison camps. Everything we had worked for had been taken away as well as our livelihood, but all of the bills we owed we were made to pay every penny. Additionally, the tax collectors came with such feelings toward the Japanese that they fined them for every little thing. Fortunately, we had an attorney who had made sure that all of our books and records were accurate and up-to-date. Because of him we were spared the heavy penalties other business people in the camps had to pay. Instead of dealing with the income and sales tax collectors ourselves, the attorney had us refer them to him. Many of the Japanese in camp who had businesses were fined heavily, even fines that were based on ridiculous reasons, and the Japanese had to pay them even though they were incarcerated.

We had our attorney and a judge as friends. They were wonderful to us and made sure that our affairs were taken care of even though we were in camp. They have expressed their feelings that we were unjustly imprisoned. They knew us and have constantly stated that they knew that Roy and I were truly Americans. And they knew that we made many, many contributions to the community as well as other charitable organizations. While we were still at the Farmers' Market, I helped organize a fundraiser for the Chinese when Japan had invaded Manchuria. Yet in spite of all we did, we were still sent to camp. Because there was pro-Chinese sentiment in our community, we pitched in to help. All that didn't seem to matter. We were herded into camps just like cattle at the expense of the tax payers and that didn't seem to matter. I felt that all that was unnecessary because we were taxpayers taking care of ourselves and our community. We were self-supporting but now had to depend on the government while we were interned. We could not leave the area which was surrounded by guards and barbed wires. Caucasions could come and go, but the guards made sure that none of us left.

My husband, Roy, had started the floral business with one store in 1925. In 1928 or 1929, he acquired the second one. The first one was called the Melvine Floral, and the second, the Melrose Flower Shop. He insured that each store had maintained its own individuality matching the particular location. When we got married in July 1930, he was working in both shops. When Byron was born, Roy and I had been working long hours at both stores and began to build our clientele.

As the shops began to flourish, we invested the earnings from the two shops and began with twelve others, the area known as Farmers' Market. We worked for nearly two years at the Market without any returns and a few of the original group had quit business. After the two years, the shops began to attract good paying customers and the situation began to improve. We got back our investment within six months although we both worked long and hard hours to make the shop pay off. We were doing very well at the Farmers' Market, but when the war was declared, we were forced to leave. And in 1941, we had invested in both of our other two shops by remodeling the interior. In the one, we made a major investment by enlarging it. The people who bought our shops at ridiculous low prices were able to capitalize on the booming war economy and are now millionaires. We, on the other hand, were forced into camps and never recouped our losses.

The government began to consider releasing the qualified Japanese to live and work outside of the camps as long as it was East of Nevada and the coast states. We had a friend, Michi Tawa, who had gone to stay with some relatives in Utah. She got a part time job as a bookkeeper for the Brown Floral Company. She knew that we wanted to get out of the camp. When Leon Brown began to lose some of his employees to the better paying defense jobs, Michi told him about the two of us. Because of our experience, Mr. Brown offered to hire both Roy and me if we could get out of the camp. It took us nearly 1¼ years before we finally got the clearance to leave. We were released on October 15, 1943.

We arrived by train under escort to Ogden, Utah. From there we took the Bamberger line to Salt Lake City where we were met by Mr. Leon Brown. Housing for the Japanese was a problem during those years. We stayed at the Yellowstone Hotel soon after our arrival—this hotel has since been torn down and is the site of the Crossroads Plaza.

From the hotel, while Roy went to work, I took my son and went house hunting. I would read the rent ads in the paper and found that many, many people would not rent to Japanese. I still remember an incident that occurred at that time. In answer to a rent ad, I took my son and went to the address at Downington Avenue. While the taxi waited, I rang the doorbell. When the woman came to the door and saw me, she yelled. "Get off my property, you Jap. Get the hell off my property." She continued to yell that she wouldn't rent to any "Jap." I was so embarrassed and humiliated that I still have feelings when I hear "Downington Avenue." We found a small apartment with some Japanese family and stayed there until Mr. Brown rented a place for us.

When we moved into the house, the landlady was upset that Mr. Brown had rented it for a "Japanese." She was so angry that she turned off the water and for months I was forced to get buckets of water from a nearby store to use; even the toilet had been turned off. Eventually Leon Brown began to buy nearby houses because many of the Japanese workers were having problems getting houses. He had to endure the label "Jap-lover" and many acts of harassment because he had Japanese employees. We are still living in the house he bought and are assured we can stay there even though Roy will be retiring.

June 28, 1983, Roy will be retiring from Brown Floral where he has worked as the head designer for 41 years. This year he will also be celebrating his 85th birthday. I am in semi-retirement from Z.C.M.I. where I have worked for 34 years. I was the first Japanese to be hired to work in a public service area. There were two Japanese women who were working in the alterations department, but none in the sales area. I worked long and hard hours to prove to Z.C.M.I. that the Japanese are loyal and valuable employees. Since then, Z.C.M.I. has hired many more Japanese in both the service and the sales areas. I feel that the risk Z.C.M.I. took by hiring me has paid off for them as well as for the other Japanese employees.

I did encounter racial hatred on part of some of the employees when I started at Z.C.M.I. and I feel, from time to time, there is still some animosity on part of some people. Still, Z.C.M.I. has been good to me and I believe that I have been good for the company. Although I have retired as the buyer for the floral area, I have continued to work as Z.C.M.I.'s head designer at their main store. I have enjoyed being in Utah, but when I learn about those who got our shops and our other properties, that they have become wealthy and prosperous, I still get angry and sad to think that this country did not think enough of its citizens with Japanese faces to give us fair treatment.●

TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER: A DELICATE BALANCE

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, the issue of technology transfer to the Soviet Union has extraordinary national security implications. When the Soviets acquire our advanced technology, they gain a better understanding of our weapons systems and learn how to imporve their own weapons. This has an adverse effect on our security, and causes the United States and its allies to increase or accelerate their spending on weapons research, development, and procurement.

Because of its impact on national security, technology transfer was the subject for consideration of a panel established earlier this year by the chairman of the House Armed Servics Committee. The panel, charged with investigating the extent of the impact of technology transfer on Soviet and United States military capabilities, is convinced that the $187.5 billion recently authorized for the Department of Defense of fiscal year 1984 is affected substantially by the flow of technology.

Defense spending does not exist in a vacuum. It is affected by the threat we face, and that threat has increased dramatically as a result of the Soviets' ability to rely on U.S. technology as a major resource of its own. To the extent that our technology has helped the Soviets in developing their conventional and strategic military power, we have expanded the very threat we face. In turn, this increases the need for us to strengthen our own defenses.

The panel received testimony from the Departments of Defense, Commerce, and State, and the intelligence community that clearly indicates the Soviets and their surrogates have embarked on a systematic and centrally directed program to acquire the latest technology of the West for incorporation into the Soviet weapon system. Our academic exchange program is but one example of this effort. Americans at Moscow State University currently study issues such as musical genres in Russian music; the history of the Russian Empire under Catherine the Great, 1762-96; and the planning and design of the Soviet environment. Soviet students in the United States, however, engage in topics of study such as research in the theory and application of scientific experiments and testing power engineering objects; research in the field of automatic control as applied to spaceships; and development of recurrent methods for navigation in space and optimal filtration of hindrances.

The panel concluded that East bloc acquisition of United States and Western technology provides invaluable and incalculable benefits to the Soviet military capabilities. Evidence demonstrates that the Soviets and their East bloc allies are mounting a dedicated, coordinated effort to acquire such technology in order to increase the capabilities of selected systems and to avoid the expenditure of millions of dollars in research and development. The panel also concluded that, while the Soviets place a priority on collection through legal means, the majority of goods and technology are transferred to the Soviet Union through illegal and/or clandestine methods. The Soviet State Committee for Science and Technology establishes and identifies required technologies and attempts to acquire as much of the targeted technology as possible through legal means. When this method is not productive, the Committee for State Security (KGB) and the Intelligence Directorate of the General Staff (GRU) are tasked to obtain the technology by clandestine means. Such methods commonly include use of the diplomatic pouch, or the reexport of goods from the United States through the receiving country.

Soviet technology targets include computers, microelectronics communications, lasers, guidance and navigation systems, structural materials, jet engine fabrication technology, acoustical sensors and radar. As an example, it was estimated by one witness that Soviet acquisition of computer and microelectronic technology over the past decade has allowed the Soviets to reduce the U.S. lead in these technologies from 1,012 years in the mid-1960's to the present 35 years. We know that at least 30 percent of the known integrated circuits used by the Soviets are direct copies of U.S. design.

Make no mistake about the willingness of the Soviets to engage in these activities to embellish their interests. A nation that will shoot down an unarmed civilian airliner will have no compunction about using whatever means it can to acquire—legally or illegally—the technology to allow it to continue to act in such an arrogant manner. If the Soviets were not confident in their capabilities, one could only speculate as to their likelihood to act so aggressively. It is U.S. technology, at least in part, that has allowed them the opportunity to act with this brash barbarism.

The administration has stepped up enforcement activity against illegal diversions. Seizures of illegal diversions in fiscal year 1983 are up almost 50 percent over those in fiscal year 1982. Witnesses emphasized that if they had been prohibited from requiring the licensing of some West to West trade—as would be the case in H.R. 3231—this record seizure rate would not have been possible.

H.R. 3231 is an important bill addressing an important issue to the Armed Services Committee. Under the very narrow guidelines of the sequential referral, the Committee on Armed Services was only able to formally report on section 109 of H.R. 3231. That section relates only to the militarily critical technologies list or MCTL. While this section is certainly essential to the bill, there are a great many other provisions with which we must concern ourselves in finding that balance between the promotion of trade with our allies and effective administration of exports to those countries which are potential adversaries. With this in mind, I firmly believe that this bill must reflect, in greater degree, our commitment to our own national security by moving its substance back from its current laxness in administration of our export policies, and more toward a policy that can offer protection against illegal acquisition of those technologies.●

SOVIET ACTION BARBARIC

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I applaud the world community for its persistence in continuing to examine the events that led up to the recent downing of a Korean Air Lines passenger plane by a Soviet jet fighter. I believe the Congress acted properly in condemning one of the most serious events of the decade. For the many people whose lives were affected by the loss of a loved one, my thoughts and prayers are with you during this time of grief.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that steps are taken to insure that such tragedy is not allowed to happen again. I would like to share with my colleagues a recent editorial that appeared in the Albuquerque Journal, a daily newspaper in my district, in which this shocking incident is discussed.

[From the Albuquerque (N.Mex.) Journal, Sept. 2, 1983]

SOVIET ACTION BARBARIC

Hungary. Afghanistan. Korean Airlines Flight 007—all barbarous reminders of reprehensible, outrageous behavior by the Soviet Union, behavior that in another time would have brought open warfare.

Flight 007, with 265 aboard—including Congressman Lawrence McDonald of Georgia—an unarmed 747 jetliner, was shot down by a missile fired from a Soviet SU-15 fighter after the jumbo jet strayed into Soviet airspace. No survivors have been found.

The Soviets claimed the plane violated Soviet air space, did not have navigation lights, did not respond to queries and did not make radio contact with Soviet air controllers.

Despite visual contact between the Soviet fighter and the jumbo jet, there were no radio communications between the planes.

After Soviet fighters trailed the passenger plane over Soviet territory for two and one-half hours, a jet pilot broadcast the fact he had fired a missile and had destroyed his target.

There are at least two possible explanations: The action was deliberate and premeditated or an inexperienced jet pilot—or his ground radar controllers—mistook the 747 for an American B-52. The aircraft have similar radar "signatures."

American officials have called for an immediate meeting of the U.N. Security Council to debate the shooting down of the South Korean airliner. Other than airing grievances in a public debate, there is little action the council can take against the Soviet Union. As a permanent member of the council, it has veto power over any decision.

The South Korean government should take the lead in protesting the tragic incident. The Soviet Union should give an immediate and full account to the world community. With the evidence already at hand, it will be difficult for the Soviets to convince anyone of their innocence.

President Reagan may find it difficult to resist the growing clamor at home for decisive U.S. action against the Soviets. Critics are calling for cancellation of massive sales of wheat to the Soviets.

Others suggest that all U.S. airports be closed to Aeroflot planes and that U.S. ports be closed to Soviet ships. Some go so far as to propose calling the U.S. ambassador home and expelling the Soviet ambassador. They also suggest technological, scientific and cultural exchanges be cancelled.

Conservatives even suggest that strategic arms talks with the Soviets be suspended.

The downing of South Korea Flight 007 is reprehensible and no explanation will ever be wholly satisfactory. While the Western community might be sorely tempted to ostracize the Soviet Union for its latest barbaric act, however, such action would severely threaten world peace, a price too high to pay.●

TIME TO LOOK AT OUR ROLE IN THE UNITED NATIONS

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to again stress my concerns about the role of the United States in the United Nations.

I believe the failure of the United Nations to live up to its original goal of promoting peace, human rights, and freedom make it imperative for our Nation to reassess that role.

Many of my longtime concerns were expressed today in an article written by Smith Hempstone and printed in the Washington Times.

I urge my colleagues to read the article.

STRAIGHT TALK IN A CAVE OF WINDS

(By Smith Hempstone)

Should Ambassador Charles M. Lichenstein ever find himself down by New York City's dockside, bidding a fond farewell to the United Nations, he won't be alone. And there won't be many damp eyes in the crowd.

For when Lichenstein told the U.N. delegates they could either love the United States or leave it, he was a few hundred yards ahead of Ronald Reagan (who belatedly got in step with him), streets ahead of the White House and State Department spokesmen, light years in front of the 24 House Democrats who called for his resignation, and in the very good company of the mass of American citizens.

For the fact is that the international organization, 25 percent of whose budget is paid for by American taxpayers, is anti-American, anti-Western, anti-industrial and indifferent to democracy.

It denies full membership to real nations such as the Republic of China (Taiwan) and South Africa, while recognizing fictitious ones such as the Ukraine and Byelorussia. Its charter states it is open to "peace-loving nations," yet it grants observer status and funds to terrorist organizations such as the PLO and SWAPO.

The United Nations, which today has 158 members, is a very different organization from the one founded in 1945 with 50 members. In those days, it dared to fight for the preservation of a small nation, South Korea, against communist aggression. Can anyone imagine that happening today?

The so-called "nonaligned" nations—a group of about 120 Third World ministates, banana republics and military dictatorships that pays less than 9 percent of U.N.'s budget—votes 84.9 percent of the time with the Soviet Union. The organization to this day has not found it convenient to chastise by name the Soviet Union for its invasion of Afghanistan.

New York is a theater town and the United Nations in recent years has degenerated into a theater of the absurd in which the delegates shout ritualistic abuse at the United States, Israel, South Africa and Taiwan—and then try to pick the pockets of the industrialized nations. It is also perhaps the largest center for communist espionage in the world.

Literally millions of people have been butchered by totalitarian nations over the past 20 years while the United Nations has prattled on about "Zionism" and "racism." The organization is about as useful as teats on a boar; worse than useless, it has been used to cloak the deeds of evil men in the mantle of legitimacy.

Yet the mystique of the United Nations is such as to continue to mesmerize some otherwise rational people. My brother Kraft, usually among the more sensible of men, was so shaken by the faint prospect that the United Nations might abandon New York for the fleshpots of Pyongyang or some other Marxist El Dorado that he wrote the other day in fear and trembling:

"Indeed, if the rest of the world consented to move the U.N. at this juncture, it would mark the decline of this country as a great power."

That is, of course, pure, unadulterated horsefeathers. What the departure of 11,400 overpaid bureaucrats and a couple of thousand diplomats from these shores would mean would be fewer bills unpaid, legal summonses and lawsuits ignored, a hole in the heroin trade, a decline in espionage activity and harder times for Gotham's prostitutes. While New York City would miss the $700 million spent there annually by the United Nations, the rest of the nation would be none the worse for its departure.

Membership is another matter. While the common currency of debate at the United Nations is lies and distortions, it is worth having the United States there if only to refute them. The problem is that, with the noble exception of Sen. Daniel Moynihan, the United States until the Reagan administration had no delegate with enough guts (or political clout) to call a spade a spade within those hallowed halls.

It was Lichenstein's identification of just such a shovel that led him to point out that the world organization was at liberty to seek other premises if it was not happy with its accommodations in New York.

A Soviet delegate, Igor I. Yakovlev, had complained that, because the governors of New York and New Jersey would not allow Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko's Aeroflot plane to land at either Kennedy or Newark airports, the United States had violated its responsibilities as host country. What Yakovlev ignored was the fact that the United States had agreed to let Gromyko use McGuire Air Force Base in New Jersey, where it would be easier to protect him from the righteous ire of those who feel the Kremlin was culpable in the shooting down of KAL Flight 007, murdering 269 people.

Lichenstein said a mouthful, for all of us. For which he deserves our thanks.●

HON. THOMAS N. KINDNESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago I introduced H.R. 3668, the Contract Disputes Improvement Act of 1983. The bill corrects two problems in the Contract Disputes Act of 1978, one substantive, and one technical.

The Contract Disputes Act of 1978 has, since it took effect, generally improved the relationship between the Government and its contractors. One provision of the bill, however, has caused severe problems.

The certification provision in section 6(c) (1) and (2) requires that a contractor submitting a claim for a contract adjustment of more than $50,000 must certify that the claim is made in good faith, that the supporting data are accurate and complete, and that the amount acccurately reflects what the contractor believes the Government is liable for.

On its face, certification does not sound unreasonable. Unfortunately, the provision was added as a Senate floor amendment without comment or explanation, and without any legislative history. As a result the certification provision has been the subject of judicial interpretation.

Since enactment of the Contract Disputes Act, there have been more than 6 court and agency board of contract appeals decisions construing the act's certification requirement. As construed by these forums, certification is a prerequisite to their jurisdiction to consider a claim in excess of $50,000. In addition, they have interpreted the certification requirement as controlling the start of the interest period on amounts awarded a contractor under the act. Both interpretations are contrary to the intent of Congress.

Last year the Congress passed an amendment to the Contract Disputes Act to correct these misinterpretations. However, the President vetoed the bill, stating the amendment was inconsistent with the purpose of the Contract Disputes Act and could result in large increases in Government obligations without any corresponding benefits to the claims resolution process so carefully estabished in the Contract Disputes Act.

Unfortunately, the President was misinformed. The amendment was consistent with the original intent of Congress. In enacting the Contract Disputes Act, Congress expressly provided that a contractor should be paid interest on the amount awarded from the date the contracting officer receives a claim submitted under the act until that amount is paid. Congress considered alternatives to the date on which interest should start, and chose the time that the Government was put on notice by submission of a claim to the contracting officer. There is no requirement in the interest provision of the act that a claim in excess of $50,000 had to be certified at that time.

Frankly, the certification provision of the act serves no useful purpose. There are statutory civil and criminal penalties for making false claims which cover contractor claims under the Contract Disputes Act; 31 United States Code section 231, 18 United States Code section 287, and 18 United States Code section 1001. Moreover, the Contract Disputes Act itself provides that if a contractor's inability to support any part of a claim is due to "misrepresentation of fact or fraud" the contractor will be liable for an amount equal to the unsupported amount plus all costs of the government in reviewing that part of the claim (section 5).

With respect to the start of interest, the Contract Disputes Act was intended to compensate a contractor for additional expenditures of money required by the Government and to provide an incentive to a contractor to put the Government on notice of a claim at an early time; thereby giving the Government an opportunity to correct the situation or resolve the claim before costs were incurred or grew. The certification requirement is inconsistent with this intent because it creates delay in notifying the contracting officer. We cannot expect a contractor to certify the amount of a claim until it is reasonably certain that the amount is correct. In the meantime, the contractor has spent its money and, as the Contract Disputes Act has been interpreted, cannot recover interest. In other words, the Government gets free use of a contractor's money.

By holding that certification is jurisdictional the courts and the BCA's also have created significant procedural delays in resolving disputes under Government contracts. For example, even though a contractor is willing to provide the certification after the contracting officer has denied the claim and the contractor has appealed, the court has held it cannot hear the claim. The contractor must start all over. The certification requirement also prevents a contractor from getting a decision on the Government's liability on a claim before expending the time and resources to develop the amount involved. This is contrary to normal legal proceedings and commonsense. It is particularly burdensome to small contractors who must spend money to develop the precise amount of a claim before they know whether the Government has any legal liability.

The second part of the amendment I am offering is strictly technical. At present, the Contract Disputes Act provides that the interest rate to be paid will be that established by the Secretary of the Treasury under Public Law 92-41 for the Renegotiation Board. As you know, this Board is now defunct. My amendment provides a new basis for the rate to be established by the Secretary. In addition, it makes clear that the rate may fluctuate for each 6-month period.

The Contract Disputes Act was intended to correct deficiencies in the system for resolving claims and disputes under Government contracts. It was intended to assure companies doing business with the Government that they would be treated fairly. Fairness is a basic ingredient to obtaining better competition for Government contracts. The certification interpretations of the Contract Disputes Act by the courts and the agency boards of contract appeals do not serve these interests.

H.R. 3668 will correct the mistaken interpretations of the Contract Disputes Act and will assure that the act continues to enhance the Government contracting process. I am hopeful that the Congress will join with me in passing this legislation which is good for the Government, small business, and the taxpayers.

H.R. 3668

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Contract Disputes Improvement Act of 1983".

SEC. 2. (a) Section 6(c) of the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (41 U.S.C. 605(c)) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1) by striking out the second sentence; and

(2) in paragraph (2) by striking out "certified".

(b) Section 8(b)(1) of that Act (41 U.S.C. 607(b)(1)) is amended in the first sentence by inserting ", examined," after "selected."

(c) Section 10(b) of that Act (41 U.S.C. 609(b)) is amended by striking out "so grossly erroneous" and all that follows through "evidence" and inserting in lieu thereof "clearly erroneous."

(d) Section 12 of that Act (41 U.S.C. 611) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 12. Interest on amounts determined to be due to a contractor on a claim under this Act shall be paid to the contractor for the period beginning on the date the contracting officer receives the claim pursuant to section 6(a) and ending on the date the claim is paid, except that no interest shall be paid for any period before the cost on which the claim is based is actually incurred by the contractor. The Secretary of the Treasury shall determine the rate of interest to be paid under this section for each six-month period beginning on January 1, 1984, taking into account the then current commercial rates of interest for new loans maturing in approximately five years. The Secretary of the Treasury shall publish each such rate in the Federal Register. Interest on a claim shall be paid at the rate or rates established pursuant to this section which are applicable for each six-month period during which interest is payable under this section on that claim.".

SEC. 3. The amendments made by this Act shall apply to claims filed on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

U.S. VISION LACKING IN THE IDA NEGOTIATIONS

HON. MATTHEW F. McHUGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. McHUGH Mr. Speaker, 18 months ago the Reagan administration released a comprehensive assessment of U.S. participation in the multilateral development banks (MDB's) that many of us found internally inconsistent.

On the one hand, the assessment concluded that "continued U.S. participation in the MDB's is justified by a fundamental national interest in a more stable and secure world;" that the MDB's make a "cost-effective contribution to LDC economic growth and stability;" that "the soft-loan windows of the MDB's, especially IDA, make a significant contribution to meeting U.S. humanitarian objectives;" and that the MDB's "are one of the major vehicles for pursuing * * * U.S. economic and political/strategic interests" in the developing nations.

In short, the Reagan administration's own assessment concluded that the multilateral development banks are important instruments for advancing a broad range of U.S. interests in a highly cost-effective manner. In making specific recommendations, however, the report then went on to suggest that "the United States should begin to reduce its participation in real terms in the soft-loan windows, especially IDA.* * *"

At the time the report was released, Mr. Speaker, many of us had difficulty understanding how this recommendation could be squared with the previous analysis. It was almost as if key decisionmakers within the administration had decided to simply ignore the facts turned up by their own assessment.

Unfortunately, since the administration's assessment was released 18 months ago, the world economic situation has deteriorated, with particularly negative implications for the poorest nations and regions.

In Latin America, for example, we know that economies are contracting rather than expanding. As the recent annual report of the Inter-American Development bank put it:

In all the years from 1964 to 1980, the annual increase in the rate of expansion in the region's gross domestic product (GDP) never fell below 4 percent. Preliminary estimates indicte, however, that in 1982 Latin American GDP declined by 1 percent, as the region suffered the effects of the sharp decline in the world economy to which it is so closely linked.

In Africa the situation is much worse. In its recent progress report on development prospects in Sub-Saharan Africa, the World Bank has noted that "the deterioration in the economic situation of African countries, which characterized the 1970's, has continued into the 1980's. All major economic indicators—GNP growth rates, agricultural growth rates, the level of exports and of food imports among other indicators—remain matters of extreme concern."

In the face of what is happening in Africa, Asia, and Latin America, the Reagan administration has chosen to ignore the need for an adequate flow of development assistance to the poorer nations of the world. For example, it has negotiated a real and substantial reduction in the resources of the Fund for Special Operations of the Inter-American Development Bank, and it has reduced the U.S. share of the most recent replenishments of both the Asian and African Development Funds.

In short, the consistent signal that this administration has been sending to the developing nations is that the United States is no longer prepared to continue critical support for the soft-loan windows of the multilateral development banks.

Nowhere is this move evident than in the current negotiations for the seventh replenishment of the International Development Association (IDA). The U.S. position in the current round of IDA negotiations is that there should be a real reduction from the $12 billion originally pledged by all donors in the last replenishment to $9 billion in the proposed seventh replenishment. This overall reduction in the resources available to IDA would result in a reduction of more than 25 percent in the U.S. contribution.

One significant result of such a policy would be to seriously undermine the commitment to Africa that President Clausen established as an IDA priority for the 1980's. As the Bank's progress report points out, "increased finanical support for Africa has been constrained by the shortage of IDA resources and by the limited creditworthiness of many African countries." While the World Bank would like to increase its commitments to Africa by 5 percent per annum in real terms in the immediate future, this will not be possible unless IDA funding is considerably increased.

Mr. Speaker, every other nation in the world now participating in the IDA negotiations disagrees with the U.S. call for a reduced level of funding for IDA. Many of those nations are close allies of the United States, with similar economic and political interests. Many respected leaders have joined in their expression of concern about the U.S. negotiating posture. For example, as the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE) pointed out last week, Cardinal Cooke of New York has written to President Reagan urging him to rethink the U.S. position. However, the administration has given no indication that it is prepared to do so. Lacking any substantive justification for its position, it has argued that congressional support for IDA is lacking.

As the New York Times has pointed out editorially, this is a rather limp excuse.

When it comes to deploying missiles—or imposing trade sanctions—President Reagan asks his allies to think globally and follow the American lead. But when it comes to urgently needed help for IDA, which Europeans favor, his administration ducks behind the frowns of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that some in Congress oppose funding for IDA. They are certainly entitled to their views, but their opposition is likely to persist regardless of the funding level the administration negotiates. That level should reflect not so much the views of the persistent critics, but rather the real needs of the developing nations as well as our own national interests.

In the final analysis, what is lacking in this administration is a broader vision of the U.S. role in the world community as well as a willingness to articulate that vision to the American people and their representatives in Congress. As the Times notes, however, reconsideration by the administration of the U.S. position in the current IDA negotiations "would make the President a bigger man, and the world a better place."

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of those of our colleagues who may not have seen the Times editorial, I am inserting a copy into the RECORD at this point.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 27, 1983]

GIVE IDA WHAT IT NEEDS

Seven is not a lucky number for the International Development Association, the World Bank's lending agency for the poorest and most populous nations. For the seventh time since its creation in 1960 (by the United States), IDA is asking richer nations to replenish its funds for a three-year cycle. But alone among the major donors, the United States proposes an absolute reduction, pleading lack of Congressional support.

It is a limp excuse for a dismaying decision. When it comes to deploying missiles—or imposing trade sanctions—President Reagan asks his allies to think globally and follow the American lead. But when it comes to urgently needed help for IDA, which Europeans favor, his Administration ducks behind the frowns of Congress.

If Mr. Reagan means what his Treasury says, the American contribution to IDA will be cut by at least a fourth, to $750 million a year. Since that sets the dues for other nations, the seventh replenishment from 33 donors would total about $9 billion. This contrasts with $12 billion pledged for IDA-6 (in which the United States commitment was reduced by stretching from three to four years) and with the $16 billion urged for IDA-7 by the World Bank.

First and foremost among the victims of any cut would be the world's poorest nations, which vitally depend on IDA's zero-interest, 50-year loans. But these are not the only IDA clients. As a new World Bank member, China is now eligible for loans, and India's growth hinges crucially on a continued flow of IDA money for at least three years.

IDA loans are generous, but not without benefit to the contributors. They generate trade and enhance political and financial stability. No sensible American purpose would be served by impelling India, for lack of IDA help, to turn to already overstretched private capital markets. Nor does it make sense to say that Americans can't afford more than $750 million a year when the Defense Department spends five times more in a week.

Treasury's assessment of Congress is hardly infallible. In any case, the Administration will never get an adequate IDA pledge without asking for it. That is the course urged on Mr. Reagan by his European allies, by his own State Department and by the man he approved as head of the World Bank, A. W. Clausen. Reconsidering this paltry contribution would make the President a bigger man, and the world a better place.●

DIRE NEED OF EMPLOYMENT: A LETTER FROM A CONSTITUENT

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, like many of my colleagues who represent areas of high unemployment, I receive letters daily regarding the problems that my constituents face as a result of being laid off and who are in dire need of employment. After reading many of these letters, they take on many similarities. However, every once in a while, there is one that, while speaking of the same problems, addresses the matter in such a way as to make the reader truly understand and appreciate the severe difficulties having to be endured by those who are confronted with unemployment.

I would like to share one such letter with this House at this time. There is much to be learned by this letter and certainly contains food for thought. I encourage my colleagues and all readers of this RECORD to read this.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It has taken me quite awhile to finally decide to write this letter but I'm going to swallow my pride and let you know what it's really like to live with an unemployed steel worker and trying to keep the family together!

My husband was a Viet Nam Veteran who, after the Army, was hired by a steel company. He worked there 9 years, 8 months. After nine years of working and saving, we bought our first new home. (What we had always dreamed of.) We had a new car and truck and our life style seemed so perfect. Two months after we purchased our home, my husband came home from work and said he was laid off. He was working so well and just had a bonus that we could hardly believe he was actually laid off! Ten months went by then they announced the mill would close the doors for good. To keep making payments on our house, we sold our vehicles and any other item we thought we could live without. We put our house on the market for sale, which appraised for $64,000 but listed it at $58,000. Then on December 1, my husband fell from a tree out in the woods by himself as he was deer hunting. He broke his back in three places and broke his breast bone, among other problems. When the police first notified me of the accident, the first thing I thought of was he shot himself as he was very depressed over losing his job, etc. Thank God, he didn't. But to complicate the problems, we had no medical insurance and his unemployment stopped that day because he was unavailable for work. With no place else to turn, I had to swallow hard and go apply for welfare assistance. It took almost three months to even qualify! We had to cash in our life insurance policies which were ten years old. Every single thing we both worked for all our lives just went down the drain. We were lucky to unload our house after months of trying to sell. We lost over $13,000, but we kept good credit.

The doctor told my husband he would have to wear his back brace for seven months or longer, but being a proud man he continued to look for work which was like an obsession with him! He found a job in a core shop doing foundry work for $4.75 an hour. That barely kept the family fed, but he felt good about himself! He was laid off from there due to the lack of orders. Nobody knows what it is like to hear your husband repeat over and over every day "I have to find a job," "I'm no good, I can't even keep my family," or "What do you want me for? Nobody else does!" Sometimes he'll just sit and stare off into space and I know exactly what he's thinking! He gets very irritable with me and the kids which he never did before and I feel very guilty myself cause I feel it's me and the boys he's worried about.

Before he was laid off, he grossed $28,000 a year. In the last 12 months we have made approximately $4,000. That is quite an adjustment to make!

We had an old car that just couldn't be fixed any more. A family member loaned us some money to buy a 1977 Pinto but we needed $200 more. We called our two banks with which we did business for ten years and paid every loan off and not one payment was late. We believed if we made a loan we would pay it no matter what it took such as having a garage sale or whatever. Anyway, with our excellent credit we were denied the small loan due to his being unemployed. It just didn't seem fair!

With his unemployment due to run out very soon, we are praying that he will find a job that we can raise our family on. That's all he wants is a chance to earn a living again. He would love to get retraining but we have no money for that. Anyway, from what we were told only the men who worked in stainless steel can qualify for that.

My one son is an asthmatic and is to get a shot once a week by the doctor or nurse. It costs $15 a month for Antigen, plus $4 each time he gets a shot, plus the cost of liquid medications so I cut his shots down to every other week and I get my father to give him his shots so that we can save money. Also, I am to see a doctor twice a month for high blood pressure, which I can't keep doing. So you see I am totally for medical insurance for the unemployed! Will things ever get better around here?

These laid off men are hurting—not only pocket wise but are emotionally damaged and I feel these men should be taken into consideration.

I suppose I should send this letter to Ann Landers but I just felt the need to write to someone higher up and get it off my chest!

Thank you very much for reading this.

Please keep this letter personal though. I'm sure it would embarrass my husband to know that I told the truth behind his pretended smile!

Keep up the good work.●

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues to a woman whose professional accomplishments have served as an inspiration to others in my Third Congressional District. Mex., won the distinction of being named the Woman of the Year by the Business and Professional Women's Club in her city.

Over the years, Mrs. Buffington has given support and encouragement to many men and women who have made cosmetology their career. In addition to her business accomplishments, Mrs. Buffington has been active in community service work, politics, and has been a devoted wife and mother to her three children.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that my colleagues will take the time to read the following article which outlines her recent award, that recently appeared in a newspaper in my district, the Farmington Daily Times:

[From the Farmington (N. Mex.) Daily Times, Sept. 4, 1983]

U.N. NOT ABOUT TO RIDE OFF INTO THE SUNSET

HON. MICHAEL BILIRAKIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, recently, the U.S. Representative to the Security Council of the United Nations, Ambassador Charles M. Lichenstein, had the temerity to suggest to U.N. members critical of our minor travel restrictions on Soviet Union Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko that they could move the United Nations from New York City to somewhere else in the world if they so chose.

There are many Members of Congress who, along with me, would certainly support such a relocation, especially if it would allow the United States to reduce its contribution to that body.

For those Members of Congress who are opposed to Ambassador Lichenstein's view, I suggest they read the following editorial that appeared in the Tampa Tribune on September 21, 1983.

In addition to citing several articles of the U.N. Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a document agreed to by the Soviets and, at the same time, violated by the leaders of that country on an every day basis, the Tribune's editors suggest several reasons why United Nations delegates, whether happy with the United States or not, would be reluctant to move from New York City.

The Tribune editors' comment, while certainly tongue-in-cheek, merits careful reading by all of us, especially when it comes to remembering the untrustworthiness of the Soviet Union in its dealing with our country and the rest of the free world.

[From the Tampa Tribune, Sept. 21, 1983]

U.N. NOT ABOUT TO RIDE OFF INTO THE SUNSET

On Dec. 10, 1948, the United Nations General Assembly adopted an impressive document called the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which "guaranteed" that nobody dwelling in a U.N.-member country would be subject to the iniquities that, in fact, continue to be routine practice in the overwhelming number of signatory states.

Consider Article 3: "Everyone has the right to life, liberty and the security of person". Or Article 4: "No one shall be held in slavery or servitude. . . ." Or Article 5: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of punishment." Or Article 9: "No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile."

If the words are wanting the ringing measures of Jeffersonian prose, they are wanting even more the respect of the General Assembly itself, an institution that long ago deteriorated into a rookery of international renegades. And conspicuous even among that crowd are the delegates from the Soviet Union, one of whom suggested Monday—after his boss, Andrei Gromyko, ran into travel restrictions triggered by the wanton destruction of the Korean airliner—that the United Nations relocate in another country.

Far from expressing hurt feelings, Charles M. Lichenstein, the U.S. delegate, offered an inspired reply. Said he: "If in the judicious determination of the members of the United Nations they feel they were not welcome and treated with the hostly consideration that is their due, the United States strongly encourages member states to seriously consider removing themselves and this organization from the soil of the United States."

And for good measure Lichenstein added: "We will put no impediment in your way and we will be at dockside bidding you a farewell as you set off into the sunset".

Well, few things are certain but this probably is: The U.N. won't move from New York. The delegates, especially those from less stimulating places, would sorely miss the spiritual pleasures the city affords. U.N. diplomats, after a hard day of exchanging lies and insults, are famous for availing themselves of Gotham's swinging playpens. New York may not be everybody's cup of tea, but after growing up, say, in Accra or Assam, even Times Square probably looks spiffy.

Another thought arises: If the U.N. were to leave the United States, where would it go? Most developed countries have laws aimed at controlling air pollution, as well as zoning laws designed to keep out establishments likely to be public nuisances.

Perhaps the Soviet delegate thinks Moscow would be a fine new site, but that could be dangerous. Restaurant service in the Soviet Union is dreadful almost beyond description. Ravenous U.N. diplomats might be far more likely to accept the inevitability of nuclear war. And, after finally sampling a Russian steak, which has the texture of boiled rawhide, those diplomats might say the sooner the better.

Nevertheless, while there's no realistic chance that the U.N. will pull up stakes, it's just as well the organization has made a little news. Because we are reminded again that the United States pays 25 percent of the U.N.'s bills—$196 million this year—and it is time other countries paid their fair share, perhaps allowing Washington to cut its contribution by half.

That the U.N. annually pours $700 million into the New York economy is hardly an argument for not reducing the American donation. The U.N., after all, using New York services and, in the case of the local police, the institution is a sharp thorn in the side. The delegates enjoy diplomatic immunity from local prosecution for traffic and other violations. Thus they operate outside the law on the streets of Manhattan—even as most of them operate outside the law adopted by the General Assembly in 1948.

It's hardly surprising that the White House chose not to endorse Lichenstein's sardonic response to the Soviet proposal for relocating the U.N. The institution has its uses, even for civil and civilized nations. But the U.S. delegate's words were satisfying nonetheless.●

B'NAI B'RITH AWARDS BILL GUNTER

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to call your attention and the attention of all who read this RECORD to a prestigious award that will be bestowed upon one of the very distinguished former members of this great and civilized body.

Many here remember Bill Gunter as the outstandingly able young member from Florida who contributed so well to the work of the House Energy Subcommittee and the Agriculture Committee, performing dedicated, valuable, and thorough service in the interests of his district, the State of Florida, and the Nation. He, in fact, helped to promote in Congress a bill that was modeled on Florida's "Sunshine" statute, which Bill championed as an active member of the Florida Senate from 1966 until 1972, when he was elected to the U.S. Congress.

Since Bill left the House to seek higher office, he has served with energetic and competent devotion as a member of the State of Florida's cabinet, in the capacities of treasurer and insurance commissioner. His numerous accomplishments over the years have been substantial and lasting benefits for the people of Florida. Recently, for example, he got the State legislature to set a standard for the insurance industry to provide health insurance at reasonable rates for the uninsurable, the very old, the ill, those who cannot afford to buy insurance at normal rates.

Thus, I am very glad that B'nai B'rith has chosen to present its first public service award to this excellent and dedicated public servant, who strives to help all the people as much as he possibly can, and I want to add my high esteem and personal commendations to Bill, our former colleague and humane friend.

Bill has far to travel, yet, and I am convinced that in the years to come, his achievements and peerless performance will benefit many of our people and add great honors and credits to his already towering record in public life.

For all of us who have come to know and work with Bill and who share great admiration for his high goals, his excellent virtue, and his conscientious presence of mind, I have below inserted a brief sketch of Bill's life and career. I commend it as exemplary and uplifting reading.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

In the years Bill Gunter has served as State Treasurer, Insurance Commissioner and Fire Marshal, he has established a record as one of Florida's most effective public officials.

Gunter was born in Jacksonville, Florida, on July 16, 1934, and raised on a dairy farm near Live Oak. He was educated in the public schools of Suwannee County and graduated from Suwannee High School where he was elected president of the student body. Active in the Future Farmers of America throughout his youth, he served as national president of the organization in 1954-1955.

Following his graduation from the University of Florida in 1956, Gunter taught school in Live Oak. He then served a tour of duty in the U.S. Army, during which he was an outstanding honor graduate of the basic Army Administration Course. Gunter next moved to Orlando, teaching for a semester at Edgewater High School before entering the general insurance business in Central Florida.

In 1966, Gunter was elected to the Florida Senate. He won reelection bids by overwhelming margins and served in the State Senate until 1972. As a State Senator, Gunter was the leader of a successful effort to broaden the state's constitutional initiative provision and was a vocal supporter of Florida's "government in the sunshine" law.

Gunter was recognized as a reform leader in the Florida Senate. Under his leadership as vice chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, chairman of an Appropriations subcommittee and co-chairman of the Legislative Auditing Committee, which reviews executive spending practices, Florida became one of the few states in the nation to show an actual budgetary surplus while continuing to expand state services.

In 1972, Gunter was elected to the United States Congress, representing Florida's Fifth Congressional District. He served on the House Agriculture Committee and on the House Science and Astronautics Committee, becoming deeply involved with our nation's agricultural problems and space program.

As a Congressman, Gunter gained respect as a leader on energy related matters. He was a member of the Energy Subcommittee of the House and actively promoted the development of alternative energy sources, particularly solar energy.

From 1975 until 1976, Gunter served as senior vice president of Southland Equity Corporation, and president of Southland Capital Investors, Inc., of Orlando. On November 2, 1976, Gunter was elected Treasurer-Insurance Commissioner of Florida. Two years later he was reelected overwhelmingly to a four-year term and in 1982 ran unopposed for reelection. In the same year, Gunter was elected vice president of the National Association of Insurance Commissioners (NAIC).

Gunter has been active for many years in religious and civic affairs. He has served as Sunday School teacher and deacon in the Baptist church and has worked as an officer or member of the Jaycees, Central Florida Fair Association, Orlando Area Chamber of Commerce, Orange County Farm Bureau, Sportsman's Association, Kiwanis Club, Masons (as member of the Scottish Rite and 1979 Grand Orator for the Grand Lodge of Florida), United Appeal and other service organizations.

His awards include election by the Florida Jaycees and one of the state's "Five Outstanding Young Men", election to the University of Florida Hall of Fame and Florida Blue Key, receipt of the 1972 State Jaycee Good Government Award for outstanding public service, and selection as 1979 Democrat of the Year by the Florida Young Democrats.

Gunter is married to the former Teresa Arbaugh of Aiken, South Carolina. He and Teresa have two sons, Bart and Joel, and two daughters, Rachel and Rebecca.●

NO, SAMANTHA, THEY ARE NOT "JUST LIKE US"

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, my good friend and colleague, JOHN HILER, recently prepared a weekly column for newspapers in his Third Congressional District of Indiana dealing with the Soviets' shooting down of an unarmed Korean jetliner. That action resulted in the death of 269 men, women, and children—61 of them Americans.

Congressman HILER expressed the sentiments of many of us in that weekly column, and I wanted to bring his comments to the attention of you and my colleagues.

Congressman HILER, in his weekly column, expressed what many of us have always believed: that basic differences in values exist between Soviet and American leaders. Those differences made themselves clear during and after the airliner tragedy, and I hope those differences are not soon forgotten.

NO, SAMANTHA, THEY ARE NOT "JUST LIKE US"

(By John Hiler)

The reaction expressed by most Hoosiers to the Soviet Union's deliberate destruction of an unarmed Korean civilian airliner mirrors that of countless others—shock and outrage.

And rightly so. Who can understand or justify the virtual slaughter of 269 innocent people in an unprovoked act of barbarism? Such an action might be expected of the PLO or Libyan leader Col. Muammar Quaddafy, but it was taken by a superpower which may control the world's most powerful and destructive nuclear arsenal.

But why should that surprise a world that watched a Soviet government murder an estimated 20 million of its own people during the 1920's and 1930's? This is the same Soviet Union that has militarily crushed people and freedom in Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and most recently in Poland and Afghanistan. They have exported their repression to countless other nations through puppet regimes such as Fidel Castro's in Cuba. What are 269 innocent people to the Soviet Union?

This was no accident, nor could it have been the action of a single, trigger-happy field commander acting without full knowledge or clearance from higher officials. Numerous flights are conducted every week between Anchorage, Alaska and Seoul, South Korea—four every week by Korean Air Lines. The sky was clear and well-lit by a half-moon the night of August 31st, and the markings of the Boeing 747 are clear and unmistakable.

Its navigation lights were operating, and other than being off course, the plane gave absolutely no evidence that its purpose was other than commercial. It is remarkable that the plane was not destroyed until some 2 hours after it first entered Soviet airspace and only a few minutes from leaving it, giving plenty of time for thorough investigation by Soviet officials and contact with Moscow.

Just as remarkable has been the way the incident has been handled by the Soviets. It took the Soviet Union five days to admit to their destruction of the airplane. In the meantime and even today, they have continuously lied to the world about their involvement in this massacre. The facts are just too clear. The Soviet Union has proven beyond a shadow of a doubt their disregard for truth, justice, freedom, and human life. They have not even offered an apology or the hint of restitution to the bereaved families.

On September 5th, President Reagan addressed the Nation with undisputable facts surrounding the incident. He outlined several measured responses to the atrocity, including:

We will not renew our bilateral agreement for cooperation in the field of transportation.

We have suspended negotiations on several bilateral arrangements we had under consideration.

We are working with the other 12 nations which had passengers aboard the airliner to seek reparations for the families of all those who were killed.

We are "redoubling our efforts" with our allies to end the flow of military and strategic items to the Soviet Union.

We also called an emergency meeting of the United Nation's Security Council, and 9 of 11 member nations voting (four abstained) supported our resolution condemning what the Soviets did. Unfortunately, the Soviets exercised their power of veto.

There are many who would like to see the United States take stronger actions. Ideas that have surfaced include:

Reducing the number of Soviet diplomatic personnel in the United States.

Adopting and enforcing a long-term policy restricting Soviet access to our Nation's technology and economic resources.

Breaking off arms limitation and reduction talks and other sensitive negotiations.

Breaking off the recently-signed grain agreement.

While some further steps might be called for, I am strongly opposed to breaking off the grain agreement. The disasterous Carter grain embargo should have demonstrated to us that a unilateral grain embargo only hurts U.S. farmers. I also oppose breaking off arms limitation and reduction talks. The guest for an equitable arms agreement remains of paramount importance.

It is disheartening that the world has to witness the murder of 269 innocent civilians before fully comprehending that the Soviet Union does not share the same values as the rest of us. However, if anything of value is to come of the airliner massacre, maybe it will be a new-found realization that peace, freedom, and protection of human and civil rights will only come from a strong America—strong in our resolve to protect and defend those values so important to human dignity, and strong in our capability to respond to and deter Soviet terrorism.

Recently, a young American, Samantha Smith from Maine, went to the Soviet Union at the invitation of Yuri Adnropov.

She was treated to a remarkable visit, one quite overwhelming for a young child. When she came back to the United States, the media reported her every word extensively. She was a guest on morning news shows. Probably the most succinct statement she made that reflected her youthful exuberance came when she blurted out in response to a question, "They are just like us."

No, Samantha, they are not "just like us."

If you have any questions or comments, please write to: Congressman John Hiler, House of Representatives, Washington, DC 20515.●

"BIAGGI'S BRONX BOMBERS" WIN THIRD STRAIGHT SOFTBALL CHAMPIONSHIP

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, it has never happened before and it may never happen again, but my own "Biaggi's Bronx Bombers" have won the Congressional "B" League softball championship for the third straight year. Hailing from the Bronx, an area rich beyond compare in baseball tradition, I view this accomplishment with a deep sense of personal pride.

My extraordinarily talented coed team, which has won the championship during each of their 3 years in existence, successfully defended their title this year by defeating the U.S. Chamber of Commerce team by a score of 16 to 1. The victory made the Bombers the only three-time winner of the coveted Robert V. Rota Championship Trophy, which is named in honor of House Postmaster Robert V. Rota, whose office has sponsored the playoff tournament for the past 5 years.

I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate my distinguished colleague from New York, STEPHEN J. SOLARZ, whose "Solarz System" team won the Congressional "A" League softball championship for the second year in a row, posting a most impressive 18 and 1 won-lost record this season. The Solarz System and Biaggi's Bronx Bombers have now won five of the last six congressional softball championships, proving that winning is still very much a New York tradition.

It should be noted that the Robert V. Rota Championship Trophy, in just 5 years, has become one of the most coveted prizes on Capitol Hill. In fact, interest in the tournament was so great this year that the number of teams selected was expanded from 32 to 46. Needless to say, the competition was fierce. Having witnessed the growth of the tournament and its tremendous success over the past 3 years, I want to express a special word of thanks to Bob Rota for his sponsorship, and to tournament director Gary Caruso and the Association of House Democratic Press Assistants for running the tournament. They have provided a most enjoyable time for all participants and spectators.

Over 200 teams participate in the Congressional "B" League, with the 46 top teams this year being selected to play in the season-ending championship tournament. The league is comprised primarily of teams from congressional offices, but also includes teams representing Government agencies and lobbying groups.

The Bombers outscored their opposition during this year's five-game, single-elimination tournament by a lopsided margin of 70 to 18. Their toughest test came during their semifinal game when they battled back from a two-run deficit in the bottom of the 10th inning to win 9 to 8 over the "Outhouse Gang," a very talented team made up of Secret Service officers and former staffers for President Ford. The Outhouse Gang was the 1980 winner of the Robert V. Rota Championship Trophy.

At this time I want to individually acknowledge those Bombers who provided the heroics during this year's tournament. They include:

Donny Allison—a genuine star who hit .600 with numerous clutch hits, and played a solid shortstop;

Sandy Barros—who provided yet another dazzling pitching performance during this year's playoffs and batted a very respectable .333;

Bob Blancato—who was nothing short of awesome at the plate, leading the team with 2 home runs and 15 total hits in 20 at bats for a sizzling .750 batting average, as well as knocking in the tying and game-winning runs in our pressure packed extra-inning semifinal contest;

Mary Boyle—who played consistently in the field and batted .333, driving in three important runs in the first game;

Craig Floyd—who, for the third straight year, captained my team, batted .647, including six doubles, and turned in a sterling performance at second base;

Glenn Goldberg—who batted .688 and, as is his custom, played flawless defense at both shortstop and third base;

Terri Karamanos—who batted 1.000 and knocked in two key runs in the first playoff game;

Mike Lewan—a team leader who batted .550, scored seven runs, and drove in six others, in addition to an outstanding defensive effort at first base;

Ted Manjoras—a newcomer this year, who proved highly valuable as a steady performer in center field, as well as at the plate where he batted .556 and scored seven runs;

Nicki Phillips—who sparked the team as leadoff batter with a .700 batting average, 14 for 20, and 10 runs scored, not to mention a versatile defensive role at both third base and right field;

Cathy Ramsay—who displayed her superior athletic prowess and competitive spirit in short field and at the plate where she batted an impressive .385, tops among female starters;

Lois Rawson—an outstanding athlete who batted .364, including a two-run triple in the second playoff game;

Rich Rawson—who played a spectacular left field throughout the playoffs, hit a critical grand-slam home run in the tough second round playoff game, and led the team in runs batted in with 10; and

Jim Serafin—who turned in a remarkable performance at bat with seven hits in seven times at bat for a 1.000 average, and who was responsible for some equally impressive heroics in right field.

Other standouts on my championship team include catchers Edith Adams and Fritizi Armacost, both dependable performers in the field and at the plate; utility infielders Tom Fitzpatrick and Frank Washington, cagey veterans of the team; outfielder Greg Lange, who batted well and played flawlessly in the field throughout the year; rookie first baseman George Penny, who proved to be an important addition to the team providing dependable fielding and timely hitting; Bill Ziegler, a mainstay on the team from year one, who played spectacularly all season until he was forced to return to graduate school prior to this year's playoffs; and Fred Burns-O'Brien, a newcomer to the team who served as an inspirational leader and coach.

A very special mention must be made about two of the team's most valuable players, both on and off the field. In addition to their outstanding performances at bat and as catchers, Moya Benoit and Veronica Floyd were the real anchors of my team, adding stability and much-needed leadership to the Bombers. On reflection, their contributions were the intangibles that often go unnoticed, but are absolutely essential to any championship performance.

Mr. Speaker, since their formation 3 years ago, Biaggi's Bronx Bombers have amassed a 68 and 11 won-lost record, including a perfect 15 and 0 record in playoff competition, and a 16 and 3 record this year. These are very impressive numbers by any standard. Needless to say, the team has given me much pleasure over the past 3 years and I want them to know that I am very proud to be associated with such a classy group of young men and women. As we contemplate the future of Biaggi's Bronx Bombers, let me say with all sincerity, "Thanks for the memories."●

WASTE, PRIVACY, AND COMPUTER MATCHING

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I insert my Washington report for September 28, 1983, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

The report follows:

WASTE, PRIVACY, AND COMPUTER MATCHING

Everyone wants to eliminate waste and fraud in government programs. Everyone also wants to protect the right to privacy. With the extensive and growing use of computers in government, however, a conflict looms between these two worthy objectives of public policy. You can count on hearing more about this conflict in the years ahead. A few comments may assist you in evaluating it.

In an effort to save money, improve administration, and enforce the law, more than 250 state and federal government projects use computers to match names in one file with names in another. This "computer matching", begun by the federal government in 1977 and even earlier by a few states, is praised by some and condemned by others.

Without doubt, computer matching can be of enormous assistance in a variety of situations. Matching has been used by the federal government to identify civil servants whose student loans are in default. It has detected physicians who bill medicaid more than once for the same services. Computer matching is being used to identify cases in which insurance payments have been too high, to track down fathers evading their child support obligations, and to pick out young men failing to register for the draft. Perhaps the most famous use of computer matching took place in the State of Massachusetts, which identified welfare recipients who had savings accounts that made them ineligible for aid.

All of these uses of computer matching, and many others not mentioned, are legitimate. At is best, computer matching insures that benefits from government programs go only to the intended recipients. It guarantees that citizens will fulfill their legal obligations. Fewer errors and streamlined administration mean more resources for those genuinely in need and greater public confidence in the honesty and competence of government.

But computer matching is not without its problems. Individuals' rights under the United States Constitution may be violated by the unbridled use of computers. Computers can invade privacy in a thousand ways, especially when they are used to "fish" through files for purposes other than those for which the files were intended.

A serious problem involves the use of data on file with the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). Permitting the data collected by the IRS to be used for other purposes, no matter how valid, could induce people to be less willing to divulge information on their tax returns. In a system of taxation that relies on voluntary compliance, this suspicion could be devastating.

Another problem arises because of the way in which computer matching is conducted. Government agencies doing computer matching are accused of assuming that individuals identified by the computer are guilty. The agencies, it is alleged, do not fully investigate the cases first revealed by the computer. For example, a citizen losing his income due to computer error may appeal, but it would be better to check for error before action is taken.

Using computer matching without examining cost-effectiveness is yet another problem. Small pilot programs indicate the type of results that may be achieved by computer matching, but calculations must also include the costs of verifying the results. This reduces the range of situations in which computer matching may be cost-effective, but insures that it will not be misused.

Computer matching techniques and extensive data banks on individuals frighten many people. A massive amount of information about Americans exists in the data banks of the IRS, the Social Security Administration, the Department of Defense, the Department of Commerce, hundreds of state and local agencies, and private banks and credit card companies throughout the country. That computer matching could bring all these data together to produce a detailed file on any citizen is alarming.

Computer matching is particularly disturbing when individuals are not aware that information about them is being divulged. The problem could become more serious as the quantities of computerized information and the methods of collecting it increase. For example, the City of Columbus, Ohio, has a special two-way cable television system known as "cube". It is being used experimentally for viewers to respond to questions, to shop at home, and eventually to transact financial business. The potential for saving time and money is tremendous, but so is the potential for abuse. Political groups could easily compile files of individual's views on the issues they respond to. Commercial concerns might use data on peoples' buying habits and preferences to target advertising and focus pressure sales tactics. In the worst case, access might even be obtained to peoples' personal financial records. Most distressing of all, all this can be done with no knowledge on the part of the individual concerned.

The elimination of waste and fraud on the one hand and the invasion of privacy on the other are the basic values in conflict here. Proponents of computer matching assert that this administrative technique is in fact less intrusive and far more efficient than similar cross-checking performed by hand: a computer searches a file only for the information it is told to collect, while humans doing the same work inevitably cull other material, too. Opponents respond that computer matching simply means more checking, if for no other reason than the ease with which computers do their work. Each side is right, but neither wants to admit the validity of the other's views.

As government operations become more computerized, one thing is certain: for years to come, we will have to set ourselves to the task of balancing the enforcement of responsibilities with the protection of civil liberties.●

TRIBUTE TO BESS DICK

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply saddened to learn of the death of Bess Dick. Bess, whose diminutive size and frail appearance belied a strong will, superior intellect, and immense courage, was the Staff Director of the House Committee on the Judiciary from January 19, 1949, to March 9, 1973. Not only is that an impressive record of longevity for a staff director in the legislative branch, but I am sure that it is a record for a staff director who is a woman. Bess Dick, by her deeds and example was certainly an outstanding role model for the generations of professional women and lawyers who have followed her.

Bess Dick was one of those unsung heroes who labor all of their lives in the service of their Government without seeking any public recognition or personal fame. She was selflessly devoted to good government, to this great institution, and to a search for the truth in the many dramatic and volatile issues that have always confronted the Committee on the Judiciary. Bess set an example of professional excellence for all of her staff to follow and which the staff of the Judiciary Committee still strives to emulate.

Bess was in the forefront of all the great legislative battles of the fifties and sixties. Those were the years of the great civil rights bills; immigration reform; judicial reform. Bess participated in the great antitrust investigations of those decades; the AT&T consent decree investigation, the Newspaper Preservation Act investigation. Bess was also involved in the passage of at least four constitutional amendments.

Nothing that was done by the House Committee on the Judiciary in those very productive legislative years was done without the guiding hand, the steady head, and sound advice of Bess Dick.

Bess was really the father confessor and mother superior not only to the entire staff, but also to all the Members of the Committee through all those years. She provided the institutional memory so important for an institution such as ours to continue and flourish.

Bess, barely 5 feet in height, was truly a giant of her time. I was privileged to know Bess; and to work with her all of the years she was here. When I became chairman, I asked Bess to stay on to facilitate the transition; which she did.

Even after retiring she never lost her love of service, her love of this institution. During the time that Richard Bolling was chairing the select committee to look into House Rules and committee changes, Bess agreed to assist as a consultant to that select committee to share her great experience and fund of knowledge of the legislative process.

Bess instilled in us all a love of the legislative process, an awareness of our broader responsibilities to the public good, and a real sense of the importance of our public service.

About Bess it can truly be said—she served us all, she served us well.

My sincerest condolences to her family. We will all miss her.●

PRESIDENT OF PHYSICIAN GROUP EXPRESSES SATISFACTION WITH COMMITTEE ACTION ON FTC BILL

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the Federal Trade Commission reauthorization bill, H.R. 2970, has been reported and may soon come to the floor of the House.

It has been gratifying that the major controversy regarding the Commission's jurisdiction over health professionals which stalled the bill in the 97th Congress has not reoccurred. Rather, a consensus has emerged among virtually all concerned regarding the principle elements of a compromise.

As an indication of the foregoing, I am here inserting in the RECORD a statement on this subject by the President of the American College of Physicians, a prestigeous national organization of doctors. The statement notes in detail the consistency of the Energy and Commerce Committee's action on the FTC bill with the recommendations of the American College of Physicians.

[From the American College of Physicians Observer, July/August]

UPDATE ON FTC—LAWMAKERS CONCUR WITH ACP ON KEY ASPECTS OF DEBATE

Editor's note: In late June, College President Richard J. Reitemeier, FACP, wrote to the Board of Regents and the Board of Governors, bringing them up-to-date on actions ACP has taken regarding the debate on the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) relationship to the medical profession, and the results of ACP's efforts. Following is the text of that memorandum:

As you will recall, the college's position is that:

The FTC has a legitimate role in monitoring the business aspects of health care delivery; and

The medical profession has a legitimate role and ethical responsibility in ensuring the quality of care and the quality of medical education and training.

Because even the most legitimate professional activities—such as quality assurance, accreditation; and credentialling—can on occasion be misused the College believes that it is in the best interest of both the profession and the public for there to be no complete exemption from examination by the FTC. As we noted in our testimony, the right of self-regulation "can only be maintained if it is not above valid public scrutiny."

As the College further stated in its testimony before committees of both the Senate and the House of Representatives, health care activities comprise a spectrum, from the clearly commercial at one end to the clearly professional at the other. Our testimony accepted that the threshold for FTC review of the commercial end could reasonably be low, but we argued that the threshold for FTC review at the professional end should be quite high. Further, we argued for a clear recognition by Congress and the FTC of those activities that are primarily professional in nature.

Subsequent to the College's testimony, the House Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation and Tourism developed legislation (H.R. 2970) that was considered and favorably reported by its parent Committee on Energy and Commerce in early May. This measure, the "Federal Trade Commission Authorization Act of 1983," is designed to extend the authorization for funding of the FTC for Fiscal Years 1983-85. Of special interest to the medical profession are those provisions of the legislation regarding the relationship of the FTC to the profession. The measure seeks to clarify the role of the FTC with regard to the traditional activities of the medical profession.

In summary, the legislation provides that:

The FTC may not use its authority to invalidate any state law that establishes "training, education, or experience requirements for the licensure of professionals" or that establishes the "permissible tasks and duties that may be performed by professionals." However, it makes clear that any such delineation of "tasks and duties" under state law must be "based in fact on specialized training or education;" and

The FTC may continue to challenge "commercial or business acts or practices of professionals."

Those of us who had an opportunity to present the College's position during the congressional hearing process—Drs. Federman, Maynard, and myself—were particularly gratified by the uniformly positive response of the committee members to the College's delineation of the issues. The degree to which the information we provided has assisted the committee in the development of its legislation is underscored in the Report of the House Committee on Energy and Commerce on the bill H.R. 2970 (House Report 98-156, Part I, May 16, 1983). This report becomes a part of the official record of the congressional deliberation on this matter.

When in a position to set forth the views of the College on public matters, it is the intention of the Officers and Regents to make a constructive contribution. All policy is reviewed carefully and approved by the Board of Regents. We take seriously this opportunity and responsibility to participate in the national debate on health policy issues. I believe that the College has made a most constructive contribution to the debate on the relationship between medicine and the FTC in several ways:

Result: The House Committee on Energy and Commerce agreed, its report stating that from the record compiled in its hearings, "The public consensus on this point is overwhelming." The Committee report quotes at length from the College's testimony: 'It is neither realistic nor appropriate for such a significant sector of the economy to be placed outside of the purview of laws governing methods of competition and unfair or deceptive practices affecting commerce. . . . Health care, taken as a whole, is in fact part of our national system of "commerce"—in the traditional and broad sense of that term.'

Other professional groups, including the American Medical Association, the American Dental Association, and the American Society of Internal Medicine, now no longer argue for exempting the profession from all FTC scrutiny, as they have in the past.

The College strongly urged a recognition of the value of professional activities.

Result: The House Committee agreed, stating in its report that, "This Committee recognizes that professional associations play an essential role in such useful self-regulatory activities as: board certification of professionals' competence and qualifications; accreditation of professional schools and training programs; and accreditation of institutions that deliver professional service, such as hospitals. . . . Another example of such self-regulation is peer review of the quality, cost, and necessity of services rendered by individual practitioners."

The Report goes on to note that "such voluntary self-regulation serves important public goals and should be encouraged. When properly structured and conducted, such activities by professionals are permissible under the antitrust and consumer protection laws. Offical FTC statements acknowledge the legitimacy of professional self-regulation. . . . Thus, the Committee finds no need for specific legislation to give new protection to legitimate professional self-regulation."

Further, the committee report quoted the College, that "underscoring existing law would go a long way toward easing the fears of many within the profession that the profession's ability to carry out its responsibilities is in jeopardy under antitrust law." The Committee further believed it desirable for FTC to "ensure that responsible self-regulatory activities are not discouraged. . . ."

The legislation now before the House would preserve valid state functions and professional activities.●

SOVIET WATCH

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, in 1935 the noted historian, Will Durant, wrote: "For barbarism is always around civilization, amid it and beneath it, ready to engulf it . . . Barbarism is like the jungle; it never admits its defeat; it waits patiently for centuries to recover the territory it has lost."

In all the history chronicled in Durant's monumental, volume work, "The Story of Civilization," in no place or time has this statement been more true than in the history of the Soviet Union and its client states.

As E. J. Dillion observed in 1930, "Sovietism is no mere philosophy content to assert itself or even endoctrinate others by convincing, persuading, or cajoling them . . . (it is) first of all a relentless destroyer of the roots of past culture, religious, social, pedagogical, and also of those champions of that culture who remain true to it, refusing to be converted and live."

So it is that the leadership of the Soviet Union, from Lenin to Andropov, have been men of unrestrained brutality who have progressively, patiently, driven back the boundaries of civilization, both Western and Eastern, with a relentless sword of blood and horror, allowing the jungle of barbarism to reclaim the Earth, masked by mendacity, propaganda, and the kindly face of socialism.

The following material is presented as another evidence.

[From the National Review, Sept. 30, 1983]

A SOVIET DESERTER TELLS WHY

(By V. Rybakov)

We met Anatoly Zakharov in a partially destroyed house not far from the Pakistani border. Zakharov, who had been a soldier in the Soviet occupational forces in Afghanistan, is now a prisoner of the Afghan patriots. I could not help thinking, as I approached the house in the middle of the night, that I, a former sergeant in the Red Army, could have found myself in his place.

Zakharov, a tall, husky 19-year-old, met us dressed in traditional Afghan robes, hands folded on his stomach in the typical Moslem fashion. He looked solemn, calm, somewhat sad. Our video-equipment operator was surprised both at the strangeness of Zakharov's appearance and because he looked healthy and well fed. Our conversation began at once, and we spoke freely, as if he were a free man, not a prisoner.

SOVIET ARMY LIFE

Zakharov's background is similar to that of millions of other young men in the Soviet Union: He went to school, got a job, was drafted into the army.

"When did you first hear of Afghanistan?"

"A long time ago. I was studying in Leningrad. One day a drunken stranger came up to me, pointed his finger, and said, 'You're going to be sent to Afghanistan.'"

"Did you and your friends talk about Afghanistan?"

"No. When I got drafted everyone said I wouldn't be sent to Afghanistan, but I was. You know, I wanted to go into the army; I thought that I would find friendship there and a good life. Some people argued with me, said that army life was bad, but I didn't believe them.

"Then, when we new draftees were being transported, we stopped off at a school gymnasium in the town of Kuybishev. There the sergeants and the elders [long-time servicemen] took away our watches, our money, all our valuables, and then they beat us up. I thought then that this was some kind of initiation—that they beat us and robbed us because we were still civilians. Things were better in Tashkent, at our training camp, where all the draftees lived together."

"How long were you kept in Tashkent?"

"A month, until we were sworn in. Then they took us right away, by plane, to Afghanistan. In Kabul they split us up into different units. I ended up in a unit that guarded warehouses. We lived in tents, in an army camp. The elders and the sergeants told us right away, 'We were beaten, now we're going to beat you.' They beat us, even while we stood in assembly, mostly with their feet and elbows. They tried not to let the officers notice. They did this every day, a few times each day. The sergeants in Kabul were worse than any we had run across yet—they were real animals. In Afghanistan everyone gets demoralized almost at once. They just kept saying, 'We were given a hard time, now it's our turn to make you suffer.' They would always try to hit us where it hurt the most. Mostly it was the career sergeants, who had already served some years."

"What about the officers?"

"The officers try to keep out of it, they depend on the elders and the sergeants. Our platoon leader, Lieutenant Galiapin, lived with his wife in a specially fenced-in tent. He was drunk most of the time. Most officers live with their wives, but I saw no children at all. They are all waiting for the houses that are being built for them to be finished."

"Were there any unusual incidents you would like to tell us about?"

"Sure, a lot. A few times the guys couldn't take the beatings anymore and would shoot at the sergeants. They would get 15-year sentences and get sent back to the Soviet Union, though Kabul has a military prison as well. Many of us smoked hashish. The Afghans would exchange it for all kinds of stuff. Once two guys swapped hashish for bullets; one was sentenced to nine years in prison, the other to six years."

"Did anyone sell weapons to the Afghans?"

"No, I haven't heard of that. But I too had an incident. We were supposed to pull guard duty 24 hours on and 24 hours off, but sometimes we would be on duty for two, maybe three days. The Afghan climate is lousy, and the Afghans keep shooting at you—once I myself heard bullets whistle by. And when you get back from duty, the elders and sergeants beat you. So once I just left my post. They wanted to court-martial me at first, but instead they just transferred me from Kabul to Kunduz. Then there were rumors that we were all going to be sent to Lebanon, but this never actually happened. I guess they wanted us to protect someone in Lebanon . . ."

BRUTALITY IN THE CAMPS

Zakharov's smile doesn't go beyond his lips; it seems as if all of this recent past happened a very long time ago. You get the feeling that this man is changed, that he is still hurting from the disappointment of military service. He had hoped it would be a fraternity of strong men, but it turned out to be a nightmare full of hatred and pettiness. Zakharov reminisces some more. Once, a sergeant, after smoking hashish, screamed that Zakharov had not done a good job of cleaning the showers and stabbed him with a bayonet. It happens a lot—"Ukrainians beat the Russians, the Russians beat the Tadzhiks, the Turkomans, the Tartars; the Turkomans also beat the Tadzhiks."

"Was there a lot of hashish smoked in Kunduz too?"

"No, very little hashish in Kunduz. There weren't many peaceful Afghans there. There was a lot of shooting, especially at our trucks. In Kunduz, the trucks travel at eighty miles an hour, but still a lot of guys get killed."

Zakharov has little to say about the Afghans, as he did not take part in battles or punitive actions. He talks more about the Soviet invasion (he is against it) but mostly about the spirit of the Soviet Army in Afghanistan.

"Even in the mess hall," he says. "Even there they gave us a hard time. They kept stealing our sugar and even the three-quarters of an ounce of butter we were supposed to get."

"Do you know anything about the Soviet Army's use of chemical weapons against the Afghans?"

"I didn't see it myself, but I heard a lot about chemical weapons. The soldiers talked about the smell of poison gas at the airports. One paratrooper told me about an engagement where they used gas. He said that the gas masks were poorly made—a lot of guys had their eyes hurt by the gas. When I was in a hospital for a few days I saw soldiers who had gone blind from the gas and others whose skin had turned black from chemical weapons. That's all I know about it."

DECISION TO DESERT

"What happened in Kunduz? Why did you decide to desert?"

"I was assigned to a construction battalion—we were building helicopter hangars. The airfield there is very large. There were hardly any Russians; most of the men were Georgians, Tadzhiks, and Armenians. It was even harder there for the newcomers than in Kabul. We lived in barracks, but the officers already had new houses. They kept hitting us with belt buckles when we worked; you couldn't even walk to the latrine, you had to run. Just before I arrived two guys deserted to the Afghans. An officer told us, 'Two guys ran away, you don't know yourselves where you're running to. This nonsense has to stop.'

"And then I couldn't take it anymore. There was this sergeant . . . well, there were all kinds of perversions. The sergeant told me that tomorrow I would have to sleep with him. 'I'll give you money and cookies, and if you say one word to anyone, the elders will cut your throat at night.' So I left. I wanted to leave at night, but in the dark I could have been stopped by the Soviets, so I left during the day. In Afghanistan, the soldiers take a break from one to three o'clock. I chose that time, and I went over the hill and started running. I looked up, and there was a helicopter above me. I pretended that I was working, looking for something. It flew away, turned around and came back. I hid in a bale of hay, took off my uniform, just left on my underwear and boots; otherwise both the resistance and the soldiers would have been shooting at me.

"I walked for a long time, without hope. I kept thinking: Some Afghans could turn me over to the Russians, others could hang me for being a Russian. Then I couldn't take it anymore and went into a house. An Afghan gave me half a melon. I was very hungry, and they didn't feed us all that well at Kunduz, just soup, some black bread, and tea—that's it. And here the man gave me a whole half a melon.

"I ate, and then another Afghan saw me. He started yelling something and I ran. Afghans were chasing me and I just kept running, as long as I could. Then they caught me and took me some place where there was an Afghan who spoke Russian. I told them everything. Now I am with them."

AN UNUSUAL CASE

Prayer time came. Zakharov excused himself, put down a prayer rug, and began to pray.

Actually, he was not a captured prisoner of war, nor has he changed sides and joined them in their fight. He was found and picked up by the Afghans as yet another victim of the Soviet-Afghan war and of conditions in the Soviet Army. It was here that Zakharov came face to face, for the first time in his life, with a spiritual world, and it happened that this world was a Moslem one. In our conversations I was amazed by Zakharov's interest in Islam and his knowledge of the Koran (the Afghans managed to find a Russian-language translation for him). It's a paradox—only after joining the "enemy" did this Soviet soldier find people who treated him in a warm, humane manner.

Zakharov's case, of course, is not typical; most captured Soviet soldiers are killed by the Afghans, partly because of the conditions of guerrilla warfare.

"Did you know that a few Soviet soldiers captured by the Afghans are now living in Switzerland?" I asked.

"In Switzerland? What are they doing there?"

I explained that they had been turned over to the International Red Cross and were then interned by a neutral country—Switzerland. He listened carefully.

"If I am returned home they'll put me in prison for a couple of years, maybe longer," he said. And then he said, more to himself than to me, "What's the point of going back to the Soviet Union?"

"What is going to happen to you here?"

"I am already a Moslem. I will live here. I'll have a family, an Afghan wife, kids."

As we left, Zakharov thanked us for the books and magazines we had brought him, turned, and went back to the house, to his new life.

A GENEROUS DONATION TO MISSISSIPPI STATE UNIVERSITY

HON. WEBB FRANKLIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. FRANKLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am one of two Members of this body who is a graduate of Mississippi State University in Starkville, Miss. This past weekend, my fellow alumnus and colleague, Congressman G. V. "SONNY" MONTGOMERY, made a presentation to our university that will prove highly valuable to its educational program.

Congressman MONTGOMERY has donated a large number of his congressional papers to the library at Mississippi State, and this information will be of great benefit to students and researchers of contemporary American history. Congressman MONTGOMERY has been one of this country's foremost spokesmen for the rights of our Nation's veterans, a primary advocate in Congress for a strong national defense and National Guard program, and a key leader in the struggle to protect the interests and rights of American prisoners of war and their families. He has, in fact, made more trips to Vietnam on behalf of our POW's than any other Member of Congress.

Congressman G. V. "SONNY" MONTGOMERY has provided students of our alma mater with a valuable set of resource material which could never be gotten from a textbook on politics and government, and I want to commend him for his generous donation.●

AMENDMENT VOTE

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, an amendment that was offered on the HHS appropriation bill prohibited funding for abortions.

I voted for that amendment with the understanding by its sponsors that even though a point of order did not allow the amendment to include an exception for an abortion to save the life of the mother, that the House conferees would include that exception in the conference committee with the Senate.

I want to make it clear that I cannot and will not support a prohibition on funding for abortions unless the prohibition includes an exception to save the life of the mother.●

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF SOVIET FORCED FAMINE IN UKRAINE

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, this week, Ukrainian Americans are commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Soviet manmade famine in Ukraine which took the lives of over 7 million innocent people. The week's events will culminate this Sunday, when thousands are expected to gather at the Washington Monument to pay tribute to the famine's victims.

In 1932–33, Ukraine, a fertile country often called the granary of Europe, was a land devastated by the horrors of starvation. Deserted villages, neglected fields, starving peasants with swollen bodies, and countless corpses were common sights. Those peasants who refused to turn all grain into the state were deported or executed. Disease was widespread and even cannibalism was not unheard of. Starving villagers who attempted to leave areas stricken by the famine were turned back at border checkpoints.

This deliberate devastation was not the result of natural calamity; it was a matter of state policy. Indeed, the untold suffering of the Ukrainian peasant was a consequence of the Stalin regime's attempts to finance industrialization and secure collectivization through the forcible expropriation of grain. Ironically, during the period of 1932–34, when the famine was raging, the Soviet Union, in an effort to finance its rapid industrialization program, exported more than 4 million metric tons of grain.

The famine was not only designed to assure collectivization, it was also an attempt to break the will of the Ukrainian nation. Stalin saw the famine as an effective way of eradicating the independent spirit of the nationally conscious Ukrainian peasant. Ukrainians, the largest non-Russian nationality in the Soviet Union, represented a serious impediment to the Kremlin's plans to create a centralized and Russianized Soviet State. Not coincidentally, the famine also ravaged the territories inhabited by the Volga Germans and Don and Kuban Cossacks, who were also viewed as posing threats to the Soviet regime.

The demographic catastrophe suffered by Ukrainians starkly illustrates the magnitude of this crime. While the total population of the U.S.S.R. increased by 15.7 percent between 1926 and 1939, the number of Ukrainians decreased by almost 10 percent. The number of those who lost their lives as a result of the famine is conservatively estimated to be 7 million people.

Mr. Speaker, the same system which perpetrated this horrendous crime 50 years ago is today committing acts which are an affront to civilized people everywhere. Just as the Soviets at first denied shooting down the unarmed, civilian Korean airliner, the Soviets denied the existence of the famine, and then, when the evidence was overwhelming, defended their action. The parallel, indeed, is striking.

The Ukrainian famine, Stalin's massive purges during the 1930's, the invasions of Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Afghanistan, the continuing and brutal repression of Soviet citizens, and the Korean airline tragedy indicate the Soviet regime's contempt of any standards of civilized behavior as well as for its international obligations.

The Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, on which I serve as Chairman, continues to be deeply concerned about Soviet violations of the Helsinki Final Act. The recently concluded Madrid meeting to the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, which included members of the Commission, represented an important forum at which the United States and our Western allies gave critical attention to Soviet noncompliance.

It is important for us to remain determined in our efforts to promote adherence to international agreements such as the Helsinki Final Act and in our efforts on behalf of those whose rights are flagrantly violated. By actively remembering and vociferously condemning the tragedies of the past, we may be able to prevent similar tragedies in the future.●

IN HONOR OF JUDGE LORENZO E. PATINO

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to honor today the life of Municipal Court Judge Lorenzo E. Patino who recently lost his 4-year battle against leukemia. With his death, the Sacramento community has been deprived of one of its finest leaders. During his short 35-year lifetime, Judge Patino served as a shining model of leadership, courage and unflagging optimism. His legacy for all of us will be long lasting.

Judge Patino was born, one of eight children, in Juarez, Mexico. His family soon moved to the Sacramento area, where he grew up and attended Sacramento area colleges and law school at the University of California.

Early on, Judge Patino showed his commitment to community service. While still an undergraduate at California State University at Sacramento, he was elected president of Sacramento Concilio, which at the time was a family service center for Chicanos. During his tenure, Patino expanded the organization into a multiservice agency that now provides employment and training, research, and other public services.

Judge Patino continued his active community work after graduation from law school, when he became a leader of the California Trial Lawyers Association. In 1980, he was appointed municipal court judge—one of the youngest members ever appointed to the court. He became known for his tough stand against drunk drivers and his efforts to keep them off the highways. In 1981, he was voted judge of the year by the California Trial Lawyers Association.

Judge Patino's greatest battle began 4 years ago when he developed myelogenous leukemia. He never stopped fighting. Despite many setbacks, he continued searching for a cure for his condition while remaining ever optimistic. Most recently, before flying to Dallas for experimental cancer treatment, he told a municipal court clerk that he would be back in 2 weeks and ready to make the changes they had discussed for his courtroom. Unfortunately, he never made it back.

The life of Judge Patino is one that deserves the highest respect and honor. His dedication to the best interests of his community and profession, as well as his passionate will to live, embody the finest values of our Nation.●

DO NOT USE OUR FARMERS AS POLITICAL PAWNS

HON. J. ROY ROWLAND

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. ROWLAND. Mr. Speaker, in these difficult and stressful times for our Nation's farmers, I wish to express my strong opposition to imposing a unilateral embargo on the export of America's agricultural products. The Nation has suffered enough from the detrimental effects of the 1980 Soviet grain embargo with the loss of jobs, exports, and a $11.4 billion reduction in overall output, without taking such action.

It is through these imposed embargoes that the United States has lost its credibility as a reliable supplier of our agricultural commodities of which we are long proud. We need to assure our foreign buyers of our commitment to supply these commodities in order to rebuild our reputation in the world market. Let me assure you that I am seriously concerned about the recent tragedy of the Korean airliner which was a horrible atrocity committed by the Soviet Union. However, I do not believe a unilateral grain embargo would be the answer to the attack by the Soviet Union.

In my State of Georgia, as well as other parts of the United States, our farmers have been severely affected by the drought. At this point, it is not known what the long-term effects from the drought will be on agriculture. In view of these facts, it would in my opinion be ill-advised to cause any further reductions in anticipated income to our farmers. It is now time to show our farmers in America that we do not intend to use their livelihood as a vehicle of retaliation in these conditions, and we will stand behind them without further endangering the agricultural community.●

TOTAL MULTINATIONAL EMBARGO AGAINST SOVIET RUSSIA

HON. RICHARD RAY

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to register my opposition to a unilateral grain embargo against the Soviet Union.

The actions of the Soviets in blasting a civilian airliner out of the sky were outrageous and reprehensible. No amount of explanation, no amount of excuses will allow me to forget this horrible act. Instead, the Soviets have demonstrated in a shocking, vivid way their disregard for individual life and liberty.

A response to the Soviet action is demanded, but that response should be multinational. President Reagan has acted remarkably in rallying world opinion on this issue. He has worked for a united, worldwide response to the Soviet action, and we must continue to present this united front.

We are all aware that unilateral action on the part of the United States would have little influence on future Soviet behavior. Instead, a unilateral grain embargo would be a severe setback for our farmers.

Those of us who represent agricultural areas know firsthand the harm such an embargo would have on the American farmer. At a time when he is struggling merely to survive, we cannot impose this hardship on the farmer. We cannot ask him to bear the burden of a foreign policy—especially when that policy would have little beneficial effect.

Since in the past our unilateral embargoes have failed to achieve much success, I could only support a multinational approach, involving as many nations as possible. Perhaps we should consider halting the exportation of all goods and services to the Soviet Union. Such an action would quickly isolate the Soviets from the rest of the world. A total, multinational embargo is the strongest possible statement of protest the world can make to a country which has so forcefully violated international standards of decency.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the House approved the Conte amendment to the Labor/HHS appropriations bill. The amendment will prohibit the use of Federal money appropriated under the bill to pay for abortion. I was unable to get back in time from another meeting for the vote but had I been present, I would have voted against the amendment. We simply cannot be applying rules as inflexible as the Conte amendment to a decision as difficult and personal as a woman's access to abortion.●

NICK CAPORELLA TO BE HONORED

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, on October 8, a distingished Italian American and a fellow south Floridian will be honored in New York by the Columbus Citizens Foundation. On October 10, he will join other luminaries such as Gov. Mario Cuomo and actress Sophia Loren in leading New York's annual Columbus Day parade up Fifth Avenue.

Nick Caporella, president and chief executive officer of Burnup & Sims, Inc., of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., has built the company into the Nation's leading cable TV and telecommunications service company in a period of just 6 years. His is a true Horatio Alger story and, in fact, he is the recipient of the 1979 Horatio Alger Award. In 6 years, he increased Burnup & Sims' revenues from $59 to $237 million and the international company has offices in 40 States. Raised in a family that knew economic hardship, Mr. Caporella was the subject of a feature article in Forbes magazine in May 1982.

Mr. Caporella's theory for success is based on the strong belief that each employee must continue to grow and expand, that the entrepreneurial spirit will control, and that self-confidence, perseverance, and compassion be the rule. His is a true American success story that continues to unfold. I join in extending congratulations to him for the honors he will receive over the Columbus Day weekend.●

SUPPLEMENTAL SECURITY INCOME

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation to amend title XVI of the Social Security Act on supplemental security income. As this section now stands, those citizens receiving this benefit are not eligible to maintain their benefits while receiving medicaid. Due to this depletion of funds, recipients are not able to maintain their residences while hospitalized.

For example, a 67-year-old woman who is blind lives alone and is the recipient of supplemental security income. Last year she was hospitalized for a 3-month period to receive hip surgery. During this time she was eligible for $25 per month from SSI based on the fact that she was temporarily absent from her residence. If SSI is reduced as drastically as such when a person is away from their residence for medical reasons, then there is small possibility of obtaining necessary money to afford the ongoing cost of rent and utilities during the period of absence.

The legislation I have introduced will allow the continuance of these benefits for up to a 6-month period. Should an extended amount of time be necessary for recovery, the 6-month period is apt time to find other means of retaining residency if it is so desired.●

JOE MANSOR WAS ONE OF TOLEDO'S FINEST CITIZENS

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, last week, the Toledo area lost one of its finest citizens. Joe Mansor died at the age of 75 after a life of service to this country, his community, his church, his union, and the Democratic Party.

It was a privilege and a pleasure to know and work with Joe Mansor. His vigor, clear-sightedness, and dedication were an inspiration to all of those he knew. He had a special place in his heart for young people—always eager to teach and to help. Joe Mansor made our community a better place in which to live and we will dearly miss him. On behalf of all Toledoans and the House of Representatives, I offer heartfelt condolences to this wife Rhea, his daughters Naomi and June, and his sister Marie.●

WATT: "CONTROVERSY MAKES THE MONEY FLOW"

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I made reference to the Interior Secretary's boasting that he generates controversy in order to raise more money for the Republican Party.

While on a fundraising swing through Western States in 1981, Mr. Watt had this to say to a GOP convention in Coeur D'Alene, Idaho:

> . . . Watt was telling Western Republican leaders with relish that he knew the storm surrounding him is helping GOP fundraising, at least in the West.
> "Controversy makes the money flow," Watt told the GOP state chairmen.
> If he were in a different position, he said, he wouldn't have the same drawing power—"so let's use Jim Watt, while we can, to ratify the Reagan revolution."
> (Rocky Mountain News, Denver, Colo., Oct. 18, 1981.)

By the time he is finished, Mr. Watt will have made locoweed the Republican Party official flower.●

THE LETTER HARPER'S MAGAZINE WAS AFRAID TO PRINT

HON. ELLIOTT H. LEVITAS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, the August 1983, issue of Harper's magazine contained an item entitled "Dunces of the Month" listing the names of Congressmen who had voted for the nuclear "freeze" resolution, as well as for the MX missile authorization.

In response to that item, I wrote a letter to the editor of Harper's on August 10, 1983. I have now been informed that Harper's will not print my letter.

They are obviously afraid that their readers would see what a lousy journalistic piece that item was and Harper's would be embarrassed by itself ending up being the "Dunce of the Month."

At this point, I would like to insert my letter to Harper's for the RECORD:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., August 10, 1983.

Mr. LEWIS LAPHAM,
Editor, Harper's Magazine,
New York, N.Y.

DEAR MR. LAPHAM: Someone showed me an item which appeared in a recent issue of your magazine, entitled "Dunces of the Month." It related to a list of Congressmen who voted for the nuclear "freeze" resolution and later, for limited production of the MX missile.

The question is "Who's the Dunce?" I vote for you.

It concerns me that the editor of your magazine, which supposedly supplies information to the public, obviously has not read and/or does not understand the difference between the nuclear freeze resolution and the MX missile vote. If your publication is a source of information for the public, it is no wonder they are frequently misinformed.

(1) The nuclear "freeze" resolution has not passed Congress. It has passed one House and has no effect at all—whatever that effect may ultimately be—until it passes both Houses and is signed by the President or passed over his veto.

(2) The "freeze" resolution calls for a negotiated treaty and has no effect until the treaty is signed and ratified.

(3) By its own terms, the freeze resolution provides for no restrictions on any modernization, testing, deployment, etc. until the treaty is ratified:

"SEC. 5. Consistent with pursuing the overriding objective of negotiating an immediate, mutual, and verifiable freeze nothing in this resolution should be construed to prevent measures necessary for the maintenance of and credibility of the United States nuclear deterrent.

"SEC. 6. Until such time as the final instrument embodying the objectives set forth in section 1 has been fully ratified by both the Soviet Union and the United States, nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed to prevent whatever modernization and deployment of United States weapons may be required to maintain the credibility of the United States nuclear deterrent.".

(4) The "freeze" resolution specifically talks in terms of overall reductions both in conjunction with and immediately following a "freeze" treaty, and negotiated nuclear arms reductions are a pre-requisite for any "freeze" to continue to exist. The U.S. arms reductions negotiating stance is based on the terms of the Scowcroft Commission's package which includes: (a) deployment of 100 MX missiles, (b) development of the single warhead Midgetman, and (c) a revised, flexible nuclear arms control negotiating position. Hence, it is obvious that the MX missile going forward on a limited and phased basis is not only consistent with the negotiated arms reductions portion of the "freeze" resolution but is an essential part of it.

This point was brought out in the debate on the nuclear freeze resolution on April 13 during a colloquy between Congressman Samuel Stratton and Congressman Clement Zablocki, the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee:

"Mr. STRATTON. But does not the distinguished chairman recognize that if this resolution were to pass today . . . the gentleman from Wisconsin or at least many of his supporters today will immediately be urging that since the peoples' body of the Congress has not spoken out in support of a freeze, it would be morally improper for us to approve, for example, the new MX missile arrangement, the Pershing II and so on.

"Mr. ZABLOCKI. That is not the case.".

Immediately following this exchange, Congressman Thomas Downey, one of the primary sponsors of the nuclear freeze resolution, added:

"Nothing, as the gentleman pointed out, and I hope that my colleagues have heard that, nothing is frozen until the treaty is put into force by the Senate and the Soviet Union."

Since it is obvious your writers did not understand (or more likely never read) the text of the freeze resolution, it is understandable that they were writing about slogans rather than substance . . . which gives them the dunce award. Too bad for the theory of an informed public!

Very truly yours,

ELLIOTT H. LEVITAS,
Member of Congress.●

CHIEF RALPH DESANTO RETIRES FROM FORCE

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, on October 15 in the home of Post 226, Brackenridge American Legion, more than 150 citizens of the community and police officers from the surrounding area will gather to honor one of their own—Police Chief Ralph DeSanto.

Chief DeSanto retires at the end of this month after 23 years on the Borough of Brackenridge's police force, the last 5 of which he served as the department's ranking officer. He leaves behind few regrets and many memories:

The borough gave me a good living, good enough to raise four kids. . . . If the good Lord gives me 15 more years, I'll be happy.

His value as a police officer will be chronicled at the testimonial dinner by his peers and partners. Among those scheduled to speak on his behalf are Robert Colville, Allegheny County district attorney; Eugene Coon, county sheriff; Robert Kroner, superintendent of county police; Charles Hanna, former mayor of the borough; Paul Davis, president of Lodge 39, Fraternal Order of Police.

Darrell W. Petz, present mayor of Brackenridge; Police Chief Frank Prazenica of Tarentum; Chief Fred Phillippi of Harrison Township. and Brackenridge police officers Jamie Bock, Carl Toscolani, and Guy Gula.

Now 60, Chief DeSanto was born and educated in the community of Springdale. Shortly after graduating from high school, he entered the Armed Forces, serving with the U.S. Air Force from January 19, 1943, until February 9, 1946.

Returning to civilian life, he held a variety of jobs before settling on a career in law enforcement. He joined the Brackenridge Police Department in 1960 and in 1977 became its chief.

A highlight of his work as a law officer was in 1969 when a prisoner escaped from the county workhouse, killed a police officer in a nearby town and became the target of a nationwide manhunt. Chief DeSanto was in the middle of that investigation. He also has encountered some rough moments in his career but, as he so often observed: "When you're getting paid to do this job, you've go to do it. You can't be a grudger."

Mr. Speaker, Chief DeSanto, I believe, epitomizes law enforcement officers everywhere and I take great pleasure on behalf of my colleagues in the Congress of the United States in wishing him a long and happy retirement.●

ROBERT GEORGE, SANTA FOR ALL SEASONS

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, his card says "Robert George, Presidential Santa." It could also say, without exaggeration, "Robert George, Santa for All Seasons," as this is a man who gives out Christmas cheer and hohos on a year-round basis.

As we all know, most men who play the role of Santa do so as a part-time hobby. Not so with Robert George who lives and breathes the part day in and day out.

Like Kris Kringle in the movie "Miracle on 34th Street," his white beard is real. Like Kris Kringle, his attitude is genuine and cheerful, helpful, and constant. Like Kris Kringle, his Santa suits are owned not rented, tailored, not stuffed.

And like Kris Kringle of filmdom, Robert George, the Presidential Santa, has his doubters. But he also has an impressive list of appreciative supporters.

In his memorabilia, he has letters from John Kennedy, Richard Nixon, Gerald Ford, and Rosalynn Carter, each in their own way expressing gratitude for his good cheer and giving, and for the warmth he has brought to others.

Mr. Speaker, I too appreciate this unusual man and his unusual vocation.●

HONORING OUR SENIOR CITIZENS

HON. J. ROY ROWLAND

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. ROWLAND. Mr. Speaker, a unique event was held a few days ago in the city of Macon, Ga., in the heart of my congressional district.

More than 1,500 people attended a massive birthday party at the Macon Coliseum held for members of the "Over-80 Birthday Club," which is the invention of Bill Boyd, a columnist for the Macon Telegraph & News. Everyone who has reached the age of 80 is eligible to be part of the club, and everyone was invited to this wonderful party in honor of people who have contributed so much to their communities over a period of many years.

I congratulate Mr. Boyd and the Telegraph & News and everyone who contributed to the program. I hope their birthday party will serve as an example for others to follow in planning activities in appreciation of our senior citizens.

As Bill Boyd explains it, the "Over-80 Birthday Club" began last year when a reader asked him to wish her grandmother a happy birthday because "the only time her mother ever saw her name in the paper was when she was listed as a survivor in an obituary." He put her name in his column, and since then he has published more than 1,000 happy birthday wishes to his special group of Georgians.

The party, he said:

> Is the culmination of the efforts of many people. And the people who came are the most deserving in the world. To survive 80 years is a remarkable story. To survive 80 years and go out to a party is even more remarkable.

"Thanks," he told his guests, "for sharing an afternoon and a smile with us."

I saw many wonderful smiles that day. It was truly a remarkable event.●

MILLIONS MURDERED BY A GOVERNMENT

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, the tragic event that my colleagues and I commemorate today remains unthinkable. That perhaps as many as 10 million men, women, and children were starved to death by a brutal regime is now beyond question. That Stalin and the Soviet Government conducted a genocide of grotesque proportions is no longer open to doubt. Yet, even today, one strains to find words that adequately denounce the act. And one can only feel shock and shame that so few people remember the extent of the act.

At one time, the Ukraine was called "the granary of Europe." Its productive land and fertile harvests were the pride of Eastern Europe, and its peasant population lived in relative happiness. Yet, 50 years ago, the landscape was strewn with corpses—first with thousands and then with millions—murdered by a government that had orchestrated the first manmade famine in the history of the world.

The horror of the event is inconceivable. But the facts are clear. First, there was forced possession by the Government of all foodstuffs, grains, and seeds. Then, those who refused to obey the orders from Moscow were either deported or executed. Finally, the famine came and a genocide commenced. Incredibly, while setting up border checkpoints to keep food from entering the Ukraine, the Soviets were exporting more than 4 million metric tons of grain.

We speak today in memory of those tragic people. We speak in sorrow and in anger. Their deaths, and the senseless horror of their plight, moves us to remember the capacity for evil that exists in humankind.

In her memoir, "Hope Against Hope," the Russian writer Nadezhda Mandelstam reflected on the terror that engulfed her nation during the 1930's:

> Stalin ruled for a long time and saw to it that the waves of terror recurred from time to time. . . . But the champions of terror invariably leave one thing out of account—namely, that they can't kill everyone, and among their cowed, half-demented subjects there are always witnesses who will survive to tell the tale.

Today, we speak in the House so that the tale of the Ukraine famine will never be forgotten. Yet, in a larger sense, we speak for human rights, for those feelings of profound longing for justice that also exist in the human heart.

As we commemorate the lives of millions who suffered 50 years ago in the Ukraine, let us also make a commitment to those who suffer today. To those who face repression, and violence, and injustice around the world, let us continue to speak and to act with compassion and with courage. Only in this way can we be sure to honor our moral obligation to the unnamed millions whose lives were lost in the Ukrainian genocide.●

INSPIRING ADDRESS AT HISPANIC HERITAGE WEEK HEARINGS

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, it is important that we set aside time each year to reflect on the many important contributions the Hispanic community has made to the history, culture, and development of this country.

During this year's recent celebration, Mr. Raul Yzaguirre, president of the National Council of La Raza, delivered an inspiring address at Hispanic Heritage Week hearings before the House Subcommittee on Census and Population.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that my colleagues will take the time to read this thoughtful speech on the Job Training Partnership Act and its implications on the crucial issue of Hispanic unemployment. As the Hispanic population grows in its importance, the need to improve their labor position will become more critical. Mr. Yzaguirre's comprehensive analysis will enlighten all of us to the benefits that can be derived from the Job Training Partnership Act.

TESTIMONY ON THE JOB TRAINING PARTNERSHIP ACT: IMPLICATIONS FOR HISPANICS

(Presented by Raul Yzaguirre)

I. INTRODUCTION

Chairwoman Hall, Congressman de la Garza, Congressman Torres, my name is Raul Yzaguirre and I am President of the National Council of La Raza. I would like to thank the Congressional Hispanic Caucus for inviting me to testify on such a crucial issue as Hispanic unemployment. Unemployment continues to be an extremely serious problem of national proportions. For our minorities and disadvantaged citizens, high unemployment rates aggravate already difficult employment barriers. The August 1983 unemployment rate for the White population was 8.2 percent; in sharp contrast, however, the unemployment rate for the Hispanic population was 12.9 percent. The Hispanic unemployment rate is consistently 60 percent higher than the rate for the White population. Whereas unemployment for the general population did not reach 10 percent until last year, the Hispanic unemployment rate has been above 10 percent since 1976. Hispanics are the youngest, and least-educated U.S. subpopulation, with an alarming poverty rate of 30 percent. Employment is thus a primary concern. The House of Representatives will soon consider passage of H.R. 1036, the Community Renewal Employment Act. We support passage of that bill because it would provide employment opportunities in community improvement projects for the long-term unemployed. However, we are equally concerned with the implementation of the Job Training Partnership Act, and such issue will be the primary topic of my testimony.

The statistics reveal that Hispanics are a visible and growing constituency with multifaceted problems which require national attention. The National Council of La Raza, in its role as a national Hispanic civil rights organization representing Hispanic organizations in 20 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico, supports a strong federal employment and training policy which focuses on providing disadvantaged individuals with the marketable skill necessary to compete in the labor market. As the Hispanic population grows in importance, the need to improve their labor market position will become more critical.

II. ROLE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING

The federal government has attempted to respond to the specific unemployment problems of youth, the economically disadvantaged and minorities. However, some of their programs have not been successful in meeting the needs of these populations. The federal government launched programs in the 1960's, namely the Area Redevelopment Act of 1961, designed to provide economic opportunities for economically depressed areas, and the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962 (MDTA), designed to provide training to those persons who had become unemployed through technology or other structural changes in industry.

Not until 1965, however, was MDTA amended to shift its focus from the technologically displaced individual to the economically disadvantaged individual. The shift in focus occurred as a result of increased unemployment among economically disadvantaged individuals and President Lyndon Johnson's "War on Poverty" agenda. Due to the federal government's active targeting efforts, Hispanic participation rates during the MDTA era accounted for 15.7 percent.

The 1970's witnessed the birth of federalism and its decentralized policies. Thus, the federal government decentralized employment and training programs, giving increased responsibility to the states. In 1973, the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA) was enacted to provide job training and employment opportunities for the economically disadvantaged, unemployed and underemployed persons. CETA gave states and local governments the major responsibility for planning, administering and operating manpower programs in their jurisdictions. In 1978, with a population about 50 percent larger than it was during the 1960's, Hispanic participation under CETA accounted for 10.2 percent of total clients, a decrease of one-third from MDTA levels. CETA was amended in 1978 to increase federal oversight and targeting, and Hispanic participation increased to 14 percent of the total client population.

This experience leads to the clear conclusion that strong targeting and federal oversight are necessary to assure equitable access to employment programs by Hispanics and other disadvantaged individuals. Decentralized programs void of targeting provisions and federal oversight, such as the Job Training Partnership Act, are more than likely to underserve Hispanics.

III. THE JOB TRAINING PARTNERSHIP ACT

As you know, the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) will replace CETA as the primary federal employment and training legislation, effective October 1st. The Job Training Partnership Act seeks to prepare youth and unskilled adults for entry into the labor market and to afford job training to those economically disadvantaged who are in need of such training to obtain productive employment. Thus, its purposes are not unlike those of CETA. In order to accomplish such goals, the Act espouses four major principles:

A. Decentralization;

B. Private sector involvement in policymaking;

C. Training, not income maintenance; and

D. Performance, not process.

The National Council of La Raza has grave concerns that the principles embodied by the Job Training Partnership Act may limit the access to JTPA programs by Hispanic clients and Hispanic community-based organizations.

A. Decentralization

The Job Training Partnership Act illustrates a shift in duties between the federal and state governments. Whereas under CETA, employment and training programs were under the responsibility of the federal and local governments, under JTPA, these programs fall under the responsibility of the state and local governments, with the State as primary actor and the federal government assuming a less than minimal role.

JTPA decentralizes the employment and training programs. It represents a further delegation of federal authority to the states. It greatly increases state responsibility for the authority over local operations, imposing states as a layer between Washington and local programs. In addition, the Governor's authority to set statewide goals and objectives, enforce coordination criteria, and reorganize Service Delivery Areas (SDAs) represents a potentially important shift in authority from the local to the state level.

In line with the concept of decentralization, the Department of Labor (DOL), has issued regulations for JTPA which give states maximum authority to interpret most provisions of the law. The effect of DOL's approach is to create a policy and oversight void. Thus, it will be up to the states to fill this void in a manner consistent with the intent of the law. Granting such discretion to the States may result in a lack of uniform protections for Hispanics, other minorities, disadvantaged and powerless individuals who have relied on the federal government as the source for enforcement of protections such as nondiscrimination, targeting, and equal access to employment programs.

With federalism as its rationale, the Department of Labor (DOL) issued regulations much briefer than the law itself. These regulations grant an inordinate amount of discretion to states in interpreting the law. The result may be 50 different interpretations with hardly any uniformity. For example, the final regulations issued by DOL did not establish nationally consistent definitions of a participant's "family" and what constitutes "family income"—two constructs fundamental to determining participant eligibility. If there is no national standard by which individuals will be deemed eligible, each state has the authority to define eligibility differently. A possible scenario might be done in which a participant's "family income" is deemed too high to make him/her eligible for services in one state, whereas, in a neighboring state, the definition of "family income" may be flexible and thus make the same participant eligible for services. The Department of Labor's "hands-off" approach encourages varied and conflicting interpretations. Such may result in lawsuits based on inconsistent state definitions, thereby denying citizens equal protection of the law.

An effect of decentralization is the decrease in federal oversight to accomplish stated national goals. The 1978 amendments to CETA increased the federal role in targeting efforts. Whereas CETA prescribed services "to be made available" to "significant segments" of the population, JTPA merely suggests that local programs "shall make efforts" to provide equitable services to "substantial segments" of the eligible population. The differences in language illustrate a strong mandate for targeting in CETA versus a permissive approach to targeting the JTPA. JTPA is a training program whose content—including determination of the client population—is left to the discretion of the states.

The provisions regarding the job training plan further demonstrate the lack of targeting which accompanies JTPA. Under CETA, each prime sponsor was required to submit a plan to the Department of Labor detailing the services it planned and the manner in which those services would be delivered. Provisions of CETA specified 37 different elements that had to be included in the plan, including targeting provisions which established a requirement for affirmative services to one group or another: significant segments, low-income persons, veterans, youth, persons with limited English proficiency, offenders, etc. Although JTPA calls for a job training plan to be submitted to the Governor, not to the Department of Labor, it specifies only ten provisions that must be addressed by the plan and none of these call for targeted or affirmative or priority services. Under JTPA, the success of the job training plan, from an equal opportunity perspective, will depend on the commitment to this ideal by state and local officials. There is no federal oversight to prevent civil rights violations, thus the state is responsible and accountable for any acts of discrimination on the part of its subrecipients.

Since JTPA delegates to the service providers and the States discretion in deciding who is eligible to receive services, specific efforts to ensure equal opportunity and nondiscrimination become all the more critical. With the authority that is conveyed to the Governor to administer a job training program is a concomitant responsibility to see that the program is implemented free of any discrimination and provides equal opportunity for all.

B. Private sector involvement in policymaking

JTPA's strong focus on private sector involvement is useful since private business and industry are the primary sources of unsubsidized employment. The Act mandates that half the membership of the Private Industry Councils (PICs), which govern JTPA activities at the local level, be from private industry. The PIC, in partnership with the local elected official, has overall policy and oversight responsibility for local job training programs. JTPA differs from CETA by granting the PICs a far more definitive role in the policy design of employment programs. However, it is questionable whether private industry alone can design a policy targeted to meet the needs of the economically disadvantaged and the long-term unemployed. Therefore, in order to achieve a responsive policy, it is necessary for the PICs to reflect constituencies such as small and minority businesses, community-based organizations, as well as minority individuals including Hispanics. Yet, initial information suggests that this is not the case.

Small business generates two-thirds of all new jobs in the United States. However, the language of JTPA is permissive on the issue of small and minority business representation in the PIC, simply providing for such interest to be represented "whenever possible." The possible exclusion of these groups in the PICs may result in a plan that ignores the dynamics of employment generation.

Community-based organizations (CBOs) play a dual role as advocates and service providers for their constituencies. They are known to have a high success rate in reaching the disadvantaged. Representatives from CBOs are to be chosen as part of a broad and extremely varied group that also includes representatives from organized labor, educational agencies, economic development agencies, and the public employment service. The statutory definition of a community-based organization is extremely broad, therefore, Hispanic community-based organizations which act as service deliverers may be excluded in favor of an organization which represents a more general constituency. Unlike specific provisions mandating private industry representation, the Act does not contain language which mandates specific numbers for CBO representation. Exclusion of CBOs may result in policies which do not effectively address the means for reaching the disadvantaged.

The language of the law with respect to PIC representation of small and minority business, minority individuals, and CBOs is therefore tenuous at best. Such ambiguity grants discretion to the local elected official, who may or may not appoint such groups to the PICs. For example, in Houston, Texas, where the Hispanic population in central Houston is 31.2 percent, there are only four Hispanics in a PIC of 42 members. In Long Beach, California, where the Hispanic population is estimated to be between 15 percent–18 percent, there is only one Hispanic in the PIC. These cases demonstrate the percentage of Hispanic PIC representation does not approximate the percentage of the Hispanic population in those cities. It is crucial that these interests are represented in the PIC planning and decision-making process. The law's ambiguity creates an excuse for local governments to exclude such groups. However, in order to create a true partnership, efforts must be made to include the public, private and voluntary sectors which is needed for a successful employment and training program.

C. Training, not income maintenance

The Job Training Partnership Act eliminates all public service employment slots and nearly eliminates funds for training stipends. CETA provisions relating to public service employment and mandatory allowances have been repealed.

JTPA requires that 70 percent of funds be spent on training. The remaining 30 percent of funds may be divided between a maximum of 15 percent for administrative costs (a 5 percent reduction from CETA) and 15 percent for supportive services, wages, and allowances.

Many Hispanic and other community-based organizations may want to participate in JTPA but are effectively excluded because they do not have the non-JTPA resources to absorb the administrative responsibilities required by JTPA, such as management information systems, fiscal accounting, or do not have the capacity to provide such systems while staying within the 15% cap on administrative costs. As a consequence, larger established organizations like the Employment Service, school systems, and training institutes which do have sizable administrative staff funded by other resources can absorb some of the administrative costs of a JTPA program. Therefore, the limits on administrative costs may preclude some of the most effective recruiters and service providers such as CBOs from participating in the Job Training Partnership Act. If CBOs are effectively excluded from JTPA, then there will be a lack of organizations which effectively reach the disadvantaged, such as the Hispanic community, thus causing Hispanic participation rates to plummet.

The lack of training stipends also affects the access to training programs by the truly disadvantaged, including many Hispanics. Due to family income needs, there may be a strong tendency for individuals to take any job which becomes available, rather than completing training. This is a particular problem for the Hispanic community which has a high poverty rate and also a high rate of underemployment. If the disadvantaged want to take advantage of a training program, they would have to incur additional expenses such as transportation and child care costs, and suspend personal job search efforts. The lack of training stipends may effectively exclude Hispanics and other minorities from participating in a training program. The law allows needs-based payments necessary for participation; however, they are to be determined under a locally developed formula or procedure, which will mean a lack of uniform standards, thereby resulting in 50 different needs-based payment formulas.

The 15 percent cap on supportive services may be waived if certain conditions are met and the waiver is requested by the PIC. This assumes, however, that the PIC will be sensitive to the needs of the disadvantaged and will want to extend greater service to those who might benefit most from training but who also can least afford the extra costs of child care or transportation. If a waiver is granted, however, the Service Delivery Area is still subject to meeting national performance standards. This may have a chilling effect because the continued application of performance standards regardless of a waiver may affect not only the local area's decision to apply for one, but also the Governor's decision to approve a waiver.

Asking for a waiver means that a local area needs more money to provide supportive services for its participants. This implies that the participants are economically disadvantaged. The economically disadvantaged are the clients with severe economic and educational problems. Thus, they are also the most likely to fail to meet performance standards based on positive placements. Consequently, Service Delivery Areas may be denied waivers because of their inability to meet performance standards due to the characteristics of the specific population they serve. As a result, the ability to serve the most disadvantaged will be severely constrained if supportive services are not increased through a waiver.

D. Performance, not process

In the past, the federal government prescribed at great length and detail how training programs were to be conducted, emphasizing the means rather than the ends. JTPA's emphasis on results is a major legislative shift in social policy. Performance standards, more than any other part of JTPA, are critical to the outcomes-based system. Their importance is emphasized by the fact that up to 6 percent of the funds allocated to the States can be used to reward high performers, and that sanctions must be applied to consistently poor performers. While the benefits of such accountability are obvious, the inherent danger of performance standards based on positive placement is that it may encourage "creaming." "Creaming" is the tendency to select as clients persons who are least disadvantaged and easiest to place. Unfortunately, Hispanics and other minorities do not fall in this category.

Community-based organizations (CBOs) are affected the most by performance standards emphasizing placement. It makes little sense to have performance standards which develop unit costs per placement without considering the nature of the client and any special problems such client may have. Clearly, the more disadvantaged the client, the more likely that effective program services will cost more and run longer. Consequently, CBOs, as well as other entities, may be encouraged to "cream" by serving clients who are least disadvantaged, have least need for employability development, and are easiest to place, in order to meet the performance criteria and get refunded. The practice of "creaming" would totally neglect the intended and most important beneficiaries of the Act, the disadvantaged and structurally unemployed. The mechanism for ensuring that services are delivered to those most in need is targeting, a mechanism which is nonexistent in the Job Training Partnership Act.

IV. CONCLUSION

The principles espoused by the Job Training Partnership Act may have a severe negative effect on Hispanic participation rates. The concept of decentralization erodes federal oversight over targeting and monitoring efforts, thus endangering equal opportunity to training programs by the disadvantaged and minorities. Hispanic, small and minority business and CBO representation in the PICs may be low due to the lack of strong language mandating such representation. The restriction on training stipends may have a chilling effect on those individuals who are most in need of training but who can least afford the extra costs associated with training such as transportation and child care. The emphasis on performance standards based on positive placements may cause organizations to "cream" participants, thus, ignoring the disadvantaged and long-term unemployed.

Factors affecting Hispanic participation, whether as clients or as service deliverers, must be identified early, and policy makers and community leaders must become aware of the need to remove obstacles to such participation and encourage full Hispanic involvement in JTPA planning and implementation. The manner in which JTPA was drafted, in such ambiguous and non-targeted language, may lead to a potential disaster. It also points out the shortsightedness of policy makers. Hispanics are the fastest-growing constituency and the youngest subpopulation group in America. Therefore, Hispanics will be the bulk of the future labor market. It will be the salaries of future Hispanic workers that will support the Social Security system. Thus, in order to achieve a long-term benefit for society in general, it is critical to have a federal employment and training policy which effectively addresses the needs of the Hispanic community. The federal government has to assume the responsibility for assuring equitable Hispanic participation and nondiscrimination. The federal government has to develop a policy which meets the economic, educational and social needs of Hispanic and other minority clients. For until all groups are equitably served, then can we say that America is back on track to an economic recovery.●

RETIREMENT OF CARL "YAZ" YASTRZEMSKI

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I think that Boston Globe sportswriter Red Smith hit the nail right on the head when he wrote on October 2, 1967, the day after the Red Sox clinched the American League pennant:

This is the City of Boston
The home of the bean and the cod
Where Lonborg stands taller than Kennedy, Ted
And Yastrzemski is some kind of god.

The euphoria in the "Hub" the day after this historic game will be matched in magnitude on Saturday with sadness as the city, and all New England, turns out to thank Carl "Yaz" Yastrzemski for his years of giving them something to cheer about.

While not everyone will be able to witness this occasion, we can all share in paying tribute to Yaz's continued pursuit of excellence. At this time, I would like to insert for the RECORD two clips from the October 1, 1967 Boston Globe "Yaz Clutch Streak Has No Parallel" by Harold Kaese, and "Yaz Wins Triple—and Then Some."

The two clips follow:

YAZ CLUTCH STREAK HAS NO PARALLEL

(By Harold Kaese)

Like a rocket that starts from a spark, traces a fiery path into the night until it explodes in a shower of light, the Red Sox have dazzled a nation by winning the American League pennant.

Whoever thought that so modest a vehicle as this team guided by Dick Williams would climb into the baseball sky to deliver streamers of excitement and the incandescent confetti of inspired effort?

"I thought we would finish about 10 games over .500 and in fourth of fifth place," said Tom Yawkey seriously, as his players drenched each other with beer after the climactic 5-to-3 victory over the Minnesota Twins.

But Williams, his manager, quipped, "I said all along we'd finish over .500."

And now for the great anti-climax—the World Series.

No known Red Sox hitter ever had a final two weeks to compare with those the Yaz delivered in the hottest stretch of the American League's hottest pennant race.

The Series can do a lot for Boston, for the Red Sox, for still unidentified heroes who may be lurking in the wings, but what can it do for Jim Lonborg, for Carl Yastrzemski?

Tris Speaker may have done it, or Duffy Lewis, Chick Stahl or some other Red Sox giant of long ago, but Ted Williams didn't, nor Jimmy Foxx, nor Vern Stephens.

As the Sox won eight out of the last 12 games for their eighth pennant, Yaz made 23 hits in 44 times at bat for an average of .523, hit safely in 11 of the games, drove in 16 runs, scored 14 and hit five homers.

In the two all-or-nothing games against the Twins, he made seven hits in eight times up.

If any player in baseball history—Babe Ruth, Rogers Hornsby, Ty Cobb, Lou Gehrig—ever had a two-week clutch production to equal Yastrzemski's, let the historians bring him forth.

Certainly no other Globe writer has done anything comparable on the athletic field, even though Leonard Fowle and John Ahern have won boat races and Bud Collins owns some tennis trophies.

Of Yastrzemski, Dick Williams said, "I never saw a player have a season like it."

And Rico Petrocelli said. "You'll never know how much he meant to us. We just knew he was going to hit."

And Tom Yawkey said, "At no time has this club ever been close to trading Yastrzemski.

In the Red Sox clubhouse, Yastrzemski wept from joy; in the visiting clubhouse, the Twins wept from Yastrzemski.

On Yawkey's 35 Red Sox teams, he has had few inspirational players Joe Cronin, Ted Williams, Dom DiMaggio. These men wore the capes of baseball greatness—but none approached Yastrzemski for combining the qualities of baseball proficiency and on-the-field leadership. Baseball is a game in which individual players seldom fire up a lot of other players, but Yastrzemski did it this season.

He did it with his arms, legs and sharp eyes, with his desire, with his optimism and determination. And even though a ball rolled through him for an unearned run Sunday, how fitting it was for him to cut down Bob Allison trying to advance the tying run to second on what looked like a double into the left field corner.

The Red Sox put it together this season, which is why they won, but nobody put it together the way Yaz did, and not many in the annals of baseball ever have.

Strategically, the games with the Twins revolved around that fact that the Red Sox pitched around Harmon Killebrew, whereas the Twins did not pitch around Yastrzemski.

Killebrew got three walks and four hits; Yaz got no walks and seven hits. The Red Sox were careful; the Twins took chances. So today the Red Sox are champions of the American League, as they also were in 1903, 1904, 1912, 1915, 1916, 1918 and 1946.

Now they have a chance to even the score with the Cardinals for the only World Series they have ever lost, and while the Cardinals look like the better team on paper, I would no more bet against Yastrzemski, Lonborg and the Red Sox than I would bet against the United States Marines.

Carl Yastrzemski of the Red Sox won the American League's triple crown—homers, runs batted in and batting average—and then some.

This is how he finished the season:

Led the American League in batting, .326.
Led the league in runs batted in, 121.
Led the league in runs scored, 113.
Led the league in hits, 189.
Led the league in total bases, 360.
Led the league in slugging percentage, .622.
Tied in home runs, 44.

No wonder a man in defeat, Mgr. Carl Ermer of Minnesota, took time to praise his enemy. Ermer said, "I'd have to say Yastrzemski is the most valuable player" in the American League.●

BOLIVIA NEEDS OUR HELP

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, October 1982, President Siles Zuazo of Bolivia was returned to his elected position following several years of military rule. Upon taking power, the Siles Zuazo government found an economy heavily in debt and on the brink of bankruptcy. Bolivia has suffered a 15 percent drop in GNP, 300 percent inflation, a doubling of unemployment, and a foreign debt of $3.1 billion. Roughly 74 percent of Bolivia's national income is currently earmarked to service that foreign debt.

As if this were not enough for a country struggling to regain its democratic traditions, earlier this year Bolivia was struck by a series of natural disasters. Over the last several months severe drought and flooding combined with hail and freezing temperatures struck eight of the nine departments of Bolivia, affecting the lives of 1.6 of the roughly 5 million population of the country. The immediate consequence has been a food shortage of 1.3 million metric tons for agriculture year 1982-83. As a result, Bolivia recently achieved the dubious distinction of having surpassed Haiti as the country with the leading infant mortality rate in the Western Hemisphere.

In response, the Reagan administration has resumed economic assistance to the Government of Bolivia, providing emergency disaster assistance and foodstuffs, and reactivating funds in the pipeline which were cut following the military takeover in 1980. However, due to enormous commitments of economic support funds to Central America and other regions, Bolivia has been denied ESF in this fiscal year, and there are no plans for commitments in fiscal years 1984 or 1985. Bolivia currently maintains $40 million in reserves, and requires $330 million this month alone in interest payments.

The Siles Zuazo government negotiated in good faith with the IMF and is attempting to address the crisis with concrete measures for the short-term reactivation of the economy. However, the threat of another coup looms constantly, as the Government is hit from the left and right for the austerity measures imposed by the IMF. In fact, the right has tried to enforce a law passed by the previous military government which would declare President Siles Zuazo's term in office complete in 1984, even though he has been allowed to serve only 1 year of that term.

Notwithstanding these political pressures, President Siles Zuazo has taken several difficult political stands. He authorized the extradition of Klaus Barbie, a Nazi war criminal charged in France with numerous murders of French Resistance Forces in World War II, and has supported the Contadora initiative, offering Bolivia as a site for negotiations. These difficult political decisions have given additional fuel to rightist parties seeking to destabilize the present government.

These constant pressures from the right, coupled with the economic chaos in Bolivia, necessitate a strong response from the U.S. Government and the Congress. I urge the administration to propose ESF for Bolivia in the next fiscal year to ease the economic crisis, and thus to truly support democracy in Bolivia. Bolivia stands as an example to its neighbors in Argentina, Chile, Uruguay, and Paraguay, that a return to democratic processes is possible and that, hopefully, the United States will look upon that return favorably and benevolently.

Mr. Speaker, I attach for the information of my colleagues a report detailing the current situation affecting Bolivia prepared by the Bolivian Embassy in Washington.

THE CURRENT SITUATION IN BOLIVIA

INTRODUCTION: THE POLITICAL SITUATION

This coming October the democratic government of Bolivia will celebrate its first year in power following a long period of political instability and military control. Among the different democratization projects in Latin America, until now Bolivia has been the only country capable of bringing it about peacefully and doing so with widespread popular support. Located in the southern part of South America, Bolivia's democracy constitutes an outstanding exception to the generalized climate of violence and of human rights violations which prevail there. It also represents a realistic and mature effort towards attaining the objectives of social peace, political stability, and economic development, sought after in Latin America.

In ten months, the government headed by Dr. Siles Zuazo has been able to create a new national mandate. Without sacrificing the dynamic of a multi-party political system, his government has been consolidating the essential building blocks of democracy for the first time in more than a decade. Within a framework of absolute respect for human rights we see the normal functioning of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government. Opposition parties exercise their rights unimpeded by government interference; there is total respect for freedom of religion and for freedom of press and expression. There are no restrictions whatsoever on either civil or trade union rights. Unlike the other countries of the region where dictatorships prevail, Bolivia is a State of Law. Of equal importance, there are no political prisoners nor repressive political bodies as existed previously that publicly or secretly threaten the rights of the citizenry.

In function of being a State of Law, the Bolivian government has posited from the first the need to struggle resolutely against drug trafficking. The new government considers this one of its most important national and international ethical, social and political objectives. Over the past years the diverse democratic * * * have been able to verify for themselves the close relation of drug trafficking to a more generalized process of social, political, and economic deterioration. Notwithstanding the Government's unbending will, the struggle against drug trafficking requires substantial financial and technical resources in order to confront the economic and military power concentrated in the hands of the national and international mafia, whose resources markedly surpass those of the national budget of Bolivia. Fully cognizant of this situation, the current democratic government of Bolivia has reiterated repeatedly its willingness and desire to coordinate its national efforts in this area with those of international agencies.

In an unprecedented demonstration of a new national ethic Bolivia's government granted France extradition rights to Klaus Barbie, wanted for war crimes in WW II against French Jewry. The current govenment of Bolivia seeks the maximum consistency between its national postulates and those of universal justice.

Despite these significant advances and notwithstanding the support of the majority of the people, the Government faces an extremely difficult economic situation following 18 years of military dictatorship. In addition to this the Government must deal with recent natural disasters, political pressure from undemocratic sectors tied to drug trafficking, and that from regional dictators that employ economic destabilization as a vehicle to return the country to military dictatorship. This serves to project and fortify an anti-democratic political project in the Southern Cone. Plagued by famine which could be used to spark an extremely violent situation, international comprehension and colaboration is needed now more than ever.

I. THE ECONOMIC SITUATION

In October 1982, upon taking power, Dr. Siles Suazo's government encountered a dramatic economic situation characterized by the following: a 12% fall in GNP in relation to the previous year; a 12% fall in mineral production; a 15% decline in industrial production; a 40% fall in imports, resulting from a sharp decline in purchasing power; a 50% fall in real wages; a doubling of unemployment since 1980; a 272% inflation rate between January and October 1982; a $3.1 billion foreign debt in September 1982, which caused the Government's insolvency and led to a declaration of postponement in fulfilling its international financial obligations; 74.1% of national income is earmarked for foreign debt service.

Faced with this situation, the new government designed an economic strategy that prescribed concrete measures for the short-term reactivation of the economy and solution of basic social problems. This necessary step laid the groundwork for both medium and long-term national economic planning. Considering the mutual support of the public and private sectors, as well as the Government's social responsibility toward the poor, the plan has two major focal points:

(a) The industrial and agricultural sector: to provide economic imports to the productive sectors; to use $217 million outside financing to rehabilitate the mining, agricultural, and industrial sectors; to invest $51 million in infrastructure.

(b) The wage policy: to reactive internal demand by developing national industry; to stop the precipitous fall in wages, a minimum wage based on a sliding scale was established; to readjust wages in relation to the cost of living index.

This economic program began to bear fruits only six months after initial implementation. Its benefits were most clearly evident in the industrial sector, where a rash of bankruptcies were halted and where the signs of a recovery were visible. Simultaneous with the economic program, the Government proposed measures for normalizing foreign debt payments. These consisted in earmarking a large percentage of foreign currency for that purpose and in renegotiating part of its obligations. Thus it was able to defer payment of $900 million by dividing it in three separate parts: $542 million in 1983; $233 million in 1984; and $125 million in 1986. Foreign investors began to be attracted by the new political stability combined with favorable signs of an industrial recovery.

This picture was rudely changed when Bolivia was struck by a series of natural disasters. Over the last several months the country suffered severe drought and flooding combined with hail and freezes. Eight of the nine departments of Bolivia have been affected. These natural disasters have affected profoundly the lives of 1.6 million inhabitants (26 percent of the entire population or 46 percent of the rural population). The damage has been devastating in both qualitative and quantitative terms: 66 percent of the potato crop, the staple food of the highland population, has been lost in an area the size of the state of Texas; droughts and floods have savaged 35 percent of the national territory or 380,000 sq. kilometers—90 percent of the highlands, 70 percent of the valleys, and 10 percent of the plains; thousands of heads of cattle have already been lost and others are in imminent danger; Bolivia's farmers and peasants have lost the equivalent of $400 million income, more than 90 percent of which is directly attributable to the combined loss of 900,000 metric tons of grains, potatoes, and vegetables.

The immediate consequence of this terrible situation is that Bolivia faces a food deficit of over 1,300,000 metric tons for agricultural year 1982-1983. It is absolutely necessary to import prior to March 1984 agricultural products whose value equals 50 percent of the foreign debt payments for 1983, and 100% of the renegotiated part of the foreign debt for 1984. Without these imports the per capita caloric intake will drop from 2,000 in 1982 to 1,200 in 1983, a level which parallels that of the worst famines in the world today.

This situation has struck hard at the industrial sector, where it has set off a chain reaction comprised of widespread unemployment resulting from a lack of agricultural inputs, the irreversible deterioration of the national industrial plant, and mounting rural to urban migration as thousands of peasants try to flee the afflicted areas, straining to the utmost public services. The current situation has led also to the impoverishment of the middle class.

The effect of this situation on balance of payments is profound. With current reserves of only $40 million it is now necessary to spend $219 million in order to import 550,000 metric tons of food, the minimum required to maintain the population's diet through the first trimester of 1984. The plunge in GNP directly affects the Treasury Ministry. Revenue has fallen at the same time Government social expenses directed at the afflicted population have risen.

II. EMERGENCY FOOD PROGRAM

Over the next 9 months 180,000 metric tons of dry food are needed to face the famine. This equals $111 million (CIF-La Paz). To address this critical situation the Government has solicited assistance from a broad range of international organizations and agencies:

(1) 60,000 metric tons of dry food have been requested from World Food Program;

(2) 120,000 metric tons of dry food have been requested from the international community through the Secretariat of the United Nations.

Until now, only 14 percent of the total needed has been confirmed; that means that 155,555 metric tons are still needed. With the exception of U.S. aid which will start arriving in September 1983, the other aid will only begin to arrive in November 1983. It is evident that the amounts of aid obtained so far are woefully inadequate to squarely face the magnitude of the problem.

Additionally, it will be necessary to import 375,000 metric tons of food for the urban population. This will be the first time that Bolivia has had to import potatoes, rice, corn, and milk. It is calculated that these imports will cost $108 million.

The aid requested is needed to fulfill three objectives:

(1) To supply the minimum food and water for the 1.6 million people affected by the disaster;

(2) To stave off a massive rural to urban migration by assuring the population's permanence in their original towns and villages;

(3) To provide the required means to reestablish productive levels in the afflicted zones.

However, it is impossible to meet the previously stated goals with only 14 percent of the required aid immediately available. It is imperative to resolve as quickly as possible the most urgent and dramatic food problems given that the bulk of assistance will not reach the country for another four months. Consequently, the Government must be able to obtain the cash required to purchase food over the next three months, and to be able to complement that with purchases in kind. The total amount immediately needed adds up to $62 million, $32.8 million of which must be in cash in order to purchase food and transport. The remaining $29.2 million must be obtained in kind.

To effectively control the aid received, the Government has proposed to the international community that all donating organizations and agencies be represented directly—or through the United Nations—in the International Commission of Food of the National Civil Defense Committee.

Bearing in mind the principles of solidarity and humanitarian aid that govern the international community when faced with natural disasters, as well as the critical situation confronting more than 1.5 million Bolivians, the current situation must be dealt with immediately and efficiently. A symbolic effort will not suffice. From both a humanitarian and scientific perspective the international community should act to defend its human, natural, and economic resources—a vital part of mankind's patrimony. Their destruction or deterioration affects the entire planet's equilibrium and productive potential.

Bolivia's hunger is not foreign. It should and must become the direct and conscious concern of the members of the international community. Aid to Bolivia is the responsibility of all those members of the international community devoted to democracy, development, and social peace. If this large responsibility is evaded, it will signify a capitulation before the defense of one of the most basic human rights: food. This would also mean the abandonment of democracy.

Bolivia's democracy is projected toward the Southern Cone and Latin America as a whole. Jeopardizing democracy in Bolivia would be a major setback in the entire continent.●

NEW MEXICO'S 150 RANCHING FAMILIES PATIENTLY WAIT FOR GOVERNMENT RESOLUTION OF OLD LAND PROBLEM

HON. JOE SKEEN

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. SKEEN. Mr. Speaker, when this Nation was engaged in the Second World War, some 150 New Mexico ranching families were asked to give up their ranch operations for the duration so that vital military testing could be conducted on their lands. Although it was at great personal and financial sacrifice, these families moved from their homes willingly in support of the war effort. At what then became known as the Alamogordo Bombing Range and is now the White Sands Missile Range our country detonated the first nuclear weapon that led to the end of World War II. Since that time, countless thousands of weapons and other military systems have been tested at the facility. The range also provided a safe landing field for our shuttle astronauts at what is now the White Sands Space Harbor. The people of New Mexico and the Nation are justly proud of the accomplishments of the White Sands Missile Range. But we cannot take similar pride in the way our Nation has treated those 150 families. For them, the duration has been postponed indefinitely. They have been reimbursed in piecemeal fashion over the years, but they have never been paid for the value of their ranches. In a manner that I believe is unique among the vast number of Federal Government land acquisitions, the White Sands ranchers were paid only for the U.S. Government to lease their operations. The sums were small and never enough to allow the ranchers to acquire similar operations elsewhere. The Government has in recent years admitted that the lands will never be restored to the original operators. Yet there has been no offer by the Government to now right the wrongs of the past by adequately paying these patriotic and patient Americans the moneys that are justly due them.

Because of this lack of action on the part of the Government, I have today introduced legislation that would provide funding for the settlement of this matter. This legislation seeks no money for damages nor any for loss of income over the years. It simply seeks to meet the obligation this country incurred during World War II. I believe it is time we brought this matter to a close. It is time that we recognize the wrong that was done and do what we can to right it. Thank you.●

FOR A SOUND MONEY POLICY SHOULD THE FED CONCENTRATE ON THE QUANTITY OF MONEY OR THE MARKETS?

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, the Federal Reserve was forced last year, after a disastrous 3-year experiment, to abandon its attempt to target an arbitrary measure of the money supply. As many critics had warned, the relationship between the money supply and the economy is not predictable enough to pursue such a policy without serious side effects. And in fact, an unexpected shift in the demand for money brought our economy to the brink of depression before the Federal Reserve abandoned the policy.

Even so, many economists today are using precisely the same reasoning to predict a sharp rise in inflation next year. Once again ignoring the demand for money, they say that past increases in the money supply, by themselves, will necessarily result in sharply increased inflation at the end of 1984. In a recent article, economist Alan Reynolds looks at this argument, and concludes that it has already broken down. According to Reynolds, the "model predicts that prices in the second quarter of this year should have been 10 percent higher than a year before, and will now decline quite dramatically unitl late 1984. If this is the model that Milton Friedman uses to predict an acceleration of inflation in late 1984, it has not worked very well so far."

Moreover, Reynolds observes, if the monetarists are right, they seem to know something the markets do not. The dollar remains strong and the price of gold, an early warning signal of inflation, remains weak. It is prices, not quantities, which matter.

I commend this timely and interesting article to the attention of my colleagues.

The article follows.

[From Polyconomics, Inc., Sept. 20, 1983]

REYNOLDS BEATS FRIEDMAN AT HIS OWN GAME

(By Alan Reynolds)

Milton Friedman, in The Wall Street Journal of September 1, explains "Why a Surge of Inflation Is Likely Next Year." Because of Professor Friedman's remaining influence in the Administration and media, his reasoning requires careful examination. It is not merely the merit of Friedman's forecast that matters—he could be right for the wrong reason—but his previously conspicuous effect on the political forces shaping Federal Reserve behavior. And Friedman is certainly not alone in predicting a quick return of rapid inflation—many influential Wall Street economists share that concern.

Friedman's article has been circulating among Administration policymakers, as a "confidential" memo, since July 16. It attempts to excuse the past breakdown of the monetarist model in order to restore confidence in current forecasts and policy advice. Friedman's first task is therefore to explain the unforeseen decline in velocity (GNP divided by M1) since late 1981. Explaining what happened in the past, however, does not explain the future.

In order to use some money stock to predict or control inflation, it would at least be necessary to predict velocity, the money supply and real growth in the future. Friedman did not do that successfully in the past two years and cannot do it now. Instead of predicting future velocity in order to predict inflation, he uses past inflation to explain past velocity: "Velocity is affected by the cost of holding cash balances. That cost fell sharply from 1981 to 1983 as inflation and interest rates declined."

By lumping together two separate events—the decline in inflation and the decline in interest rates—Friedman sneaks in Irving Fisher's seductively simple theory that interest rates are always dominated by inflation.[1] He thus evades the fundamental issue of the Fed's influence on real interest rates. Yet Friedman certainly appears to be advocating a tighter Fed policy, which has to mean higher interest rates on bank reserves. How else could a reduced supply of reserves be rationed among the banks?

Friedman thus advocates higher interest rates, and predicts higher inflation, only because he first assumes that velocity will rise. That is, we will supposedly get more inflation and higher interest rates because velocity will rise, and velocity will rise because of higher inflation and higher interest rates. These arguments are hopelessly circular, so Friedman offers three more. One is that any further decline in velocity "will simply build up more pressure waiting to be released." That kinetic analogy is no more precise or useful than "what goes up has to come down."

Another argument is that "uncertainty should raise the demand for cash balances, that is, reduce velocity. . . . Perhaps the most dramatic piece of evidence is that at the outbreak of both World War I and World War II, commodity prices fell * * *." [Emphasis added.] What is most surprising about that evidence is that Milton Friedman is using commodity prices as an indicator of periods in which the demand for money was more important than the supply. This is a position that Polyconomics has advocated for some time. Yet Friedman's specific argument would not explain why velocity (and commodity prices) would rise unless we expected monetary uncertainty to diminish. Abandoning "Friday Friedmania"—the fear of weekly M1 announcements—would reduce uncertainty, but the argument would then imply, paradoxically, that greater monetary stability would raise inflation by reducing uncertainty.

Finally, Friedman simply asserts that "velocity can be expected to rise, following its usual cyclical pattern during an expansion." The whole point of Friedman's article was to explain why the "usual cyclical pattern" has not worked for over two years. If it did, velocity would have already risen at a 6.3 percent annual rate in the first two quarters of the recovery, rather than a falling at a 3 percent rate. That is, the "usual cyclical pattern" would have overestimated nominal GNP growth in the first half of 1983 by more than 9 percentage points.

Using this same model which failed so badly in the first half, Friedman now speculates that nominal GNP will rise at a 14–17 percent rate in the second half. If he believed that, Friedman would have to predict a major acceleration of inflation right now—not a year from now. A 17 percent growth of nominal GNP, even with real growth of 6–7 percent, would require that we currently experience a 10–11 percent inflation.

The forecast of 17% growth of nominal GNP is simply the sum of 14% growth of M1 in the first half (with a six month lag) plus an assumed "typical" postwar rise of 3% in M1 velocity. But that uneven trend was based on a quite definition of money. In a recent Newsweek column (July 25), Friedman explained his switch from M2 to M1 because "the present M1 is a better approximation of the old M2." The velocity of the old M2, which Friedman compares to the new M1, did not rise by 3% a year. M2 velocity rarely rose at all, even in recoveries. On this primitive basis of historical trends. Friedman still has no credible reason to predict a sustained rise in velocity, and therefore no apparent reason to predict an inflation "disaster."

People will disinvest in money—that is, offer to exchange more money for fewer goods—if they believe the value of the monetary unit will be allowed to shrink. In that case, "velocity" would rise. But the inflation would not be "caused" by more frequent buying any more than it is caused by increased selling. Instead, as W. H. Hutt observes, "changes in the general rate of expenditure (the movement of money) are a consequence of changes in the value of the monetary unit and not its cause." [2]

Friedman's Newsweek column offered an entirely different Friedman model, here presented as Table 1, which ignores velocity altogether, and instead simply predicts the year-to-year increase on the GNP deflator by using the year-to-year increase in M1 from two years earlier. Note that the recent decline in inflation (understating by using the deflator) cannot be explained by Friedman's two-year lag. Only a brief fall in M1 due to the credit controls in the second quarter of 1980 shows up as a significant slowdown in M1 two years later. On that theory, Jimmy Carter would get all of the credit for the slowdown of measured inflation last year.

Friedman's lag model predicts that prices in the second quarter of this year should have been 10% higher than a year before, and will now decline quite dramatically until late 1984. If this is the model that Friedman uses to predict an acceleration of inflation in late 1984, it has not worked very well so far. If it works this time, then Friedman's Wall Street Journal forecast of 14–17% growth of nominal GNP in late 1983 is obviously inconsistent with the slowdown of inflation implied by his two-year lag. At least one of the two latest Friedman models has to be discarded.

Taken literally, this Friedman "lag" implies that people base spending decisions on the amount in their checking accounts six months earlier. If a corporate treasurer found a few million extra dollars accidentally sitting in a zero-interest account, then the company would eventually hire more workers and buy more inventory—about six months later. After another year and a half of brisk sales, everyone would simultaneously raise their prices (hence, Friedman's two-year lag). The theory is implausible at best, and it has led to extremely unpredictable predictions.

In a letter to The Wall Street Journal on June 28, 1982, Milton Friedman worried that money growth was "dangerously high." By August 23, in his Newsweek column, the recovery that he predicted had been "aborted by a drastic cut in monetary growth." Two months later, in an interview with Barron's, Friedman complained about a "monetary explosion" which should have already caused more inflation by now. If money growth was really "dangerously high" on June 28 last year, then the Fed should have tightened by August 23. But if that was "a drastic cut," there should have been a "monetary explosion" by October. Clearly, following Milton Friedman's advice would have produced exactly the results he later deplored.

piece of September 1, he advises that, "Continuation of present levels of monetary growth promises disaster. A sharp reduction of monetary growth would mean . . . recession. . . . There is no middle course." Friedman seems to argue that no number exists between, say, 5% and 14% growth of M1. He has offered no reason to expect monetary growth to continue at "present rates"—which means past rates— but he certainly appears to argue that we face a frightening, large inflation (he offers no number) unless Fed policy becomes tighter. If the demand for M1 slows down, as Friedman predicts, so will the so-called supply of M1. Even within a Friedmanite model, it would seem hard to worry about a "continuation" of rapid M1 growth while the St. Louis Fed reports that adjusted reserves fell at a rate of 1.1% from about June through August.

In fact, Friedman almost concedes that the seemingly rapid growth of M1 before this June may well have been an ideal response to lower inflation—not a signal of higher inflation. "The technically ideal disinflationary policy," he writes, "would not be the kind of pre-announced steady decline in monetary growth that I have always favored. Rather, it would involve . . ., as a decline in inflation and interest rates and the emergence of recession reduced velocity, raising sharply the rate of monetary growth. . . ." That is, of course, exactly what the Fed did from July 1982 to May 1983. The Friedmanites at the San Francisco Fed thus conclude that "the rapid growth of money since July 1982 . . . was required to permit nominal interest rates to fall to a level consistent with the slower rate of inflation. As such, it is not inflationary because the money is being willingly held by the public at lower nominal interest rates."[3]

Friedman's concern about the difficulty of steering a middle course is certainly correct, in the sense that any fiat money system is always potentially vulnerable to wild swings toward inflation or deflation. Indeed, a mathematical analysis by two economists from the Federal Reserve Board demonstrates that fiat money regimes are characterized by "knife-edge stability" in which "unstable price paths are fueled in part by speculative anticipations" which become self-fulfilling. "If the government fractionally backs the currency by guaranteeing a minimal redemption value for money," add the authors, "the problem of speculative hyperinflation disappears.[4]

From September 1977 to at least October 1978, for example, the dollar went into a free fall that is quite impossible to explain by the relatively temperate growth of monetary aggregates two years earlier, or by the small and declining budget deficit. Anticipating the consequences of Treasury Secretary Blumenthal's malign neglect of the dollar's value, people began dumping dollars in favor of gold, Swiss francs and antique vases. Given the importance of "knife-edge" expectations under the existing monetary arrangements, that sort of speculative flight from the dollar certainly could happen again. A relay of 1978–79 could not happen, however, without an equally enormous rise in the dollar price of gold and an equally precipitous collapse of the dollar. A monetary policy that would tolerate a sustained drop in the dollar's value against gold, and against relatively stable foreign currencies, would necessarily prevent a rapid and sustained inflation. Whether or not the U.S. has implicitly adopted such a system remains to be seriously tested, but so far the dollar is certainly not weak and speculative commodities are not strong. So long as that remains true, accelerating inflation is quite impossible.

Forecasts of an inevitable return of double-digit inflation have also been made by analysts who do not rely on tenuous estimates of money velocity or lags. Such predictions usually rely on commodity prices as a leading indicator of future price levels, or assume that recovery must be accompanied by accelerating inflation because that happened in 1973–74 and 1978–79.

Prices of commodities used in cyclical industries, such as lumber and metals, have been rising this year at a reasonable pace. If these prices did not rise by at least enough to cover production costs, the world's mines, mills and farms would still be going out of business. Just as raw materials prices fall more than prices of finished goods during deflations, they also rise relative to finished goods in recoveries. From early December through late August, the CRB index of industrial commodity prices rose by about 20%—bringing those prices back up to the level of late 1978—while producer prices of finished goods were actually reduced.

A cyclical rise in the relative prices of industrial commodities does not portend a sustained general inflation unless it goes too far. Before that happened, the price of speculative commodities, like gold, would soar. This is one reason why speculative commodities are a superior indicator or standard for monetary policy—cyclical swings are not likely to be confused with secular trends. When prices of cyclical commodities rise but prices of speculative commodities do not, that indicates a current recovery from past deflation that is not expected to reduce the absolute level of the dollar's future value.

Table 2 shows the change in measured inflation rates (GNP deflator) during the first and second four quarters of recent recoveries. It was not unusual to observe a slight increase in measured inflation during the first year, during recoveries that began with deeply depressed commodity prices. Contrary to the "restrained recovery" arguments, however, broad measures of inflation have usually declined in the second year of expansion (though this was misleading, of course, during the 1972 price controls fiasco). Any need for "restraint" does not appear after only one quarter of decent economic growth.

Before worrying too much about predictions of future inflation, it is essential to distinguish between the current level of prices, their rate of change, and their future level.

Consider two hypothetical monetary rules. In one case, a commodity price index (or gold price) would be allowed to rise only very gradually—forever. By the conventional definition of inflation, a policy of perpetual but slow price increases would seem to promise moderate inflation, but everyone would know that the value of the dollar would eventually decline toward zero at some unknown future date. Such a system would be vulnerable to speculative attack. Under a different hypothetical rule, the commodity price index might be allowed to recover quickly from, say, 270 to 320, but would then be constrained within a narrow band around the targeted level. Under this rule, the measured rate of current inflation might initially be more rapid than under the first rule, but the dollar would nonetheless be more valuable in the long run. That is, the rate of change could be faster but some future price level would nonetheless be lower. Since the long-term value of the dollar would be more secure, measured inflation would slow down as the limit was approached. The interest rate on long-term bonds and mortgages would decline immediately upon the believable announcement of even a high—but fixed—limit on some future price level, almost regardless of the rate of inflation between now and then.

An accurate concept of the value of the dollar must include its future value as well as current indexes of spot market prices. The "cost of life" is not measured by the changes in any monthly price index. Bond prices partly capture the uncertain expectations about the future level of the dollar's value, rather than its rate of change. But bond prices can at times be more influenced by immediate liquidity needs, default risk, interest rate volatility, or real opportunities to profit from the use of borrowed capital. The least ambiguous indicator of the expected long-term value of the dollar is not bond prices but rather the price of a storable and easily sold commodity, the supply of which is relatively fixed and the demand for which is not strongly influenced by cyclical industrial uses. As Jeffrey Frankel of the Council of Economic Advisers has shown, "commodity (and foriegn exchange) prices are good indicators of Fed credibility . . . particularly precious metals prices."[5]

Putting a floor under the future value of the dollar, which is the same as putting a lid on some ideal price, is far more important than the monthly rate of "inflation" at which we approach that limit. The Fed would have a great deal more room to maneuver in the short run if people knew the long-run limits. Otherwise, every weekly gyration tends to become extrapolated into the distant future—a little tightening or easing giving rise to exaggerated speculative behavior based on the expectation of prolonged tightening or easing. As a result, monetary policy has stumbled on the worst possible combination—it has neither long-term predictability nor short-term flexibility.

The year-old bull market has been reinvigorated lately by the prospect that actual declines in M1, together with weakness in several indicators of economic activity, allow the Fed no viable excuse not to ease. But how could long-term financial markets turn bullish at the prospect of easing if a serious and sustained upturn in inflation is already "baked in the cake," as Milton Friedman's lag suggests?

The cyclical recovery in commodity prices that has already occurred may well involve a one-time upward adjustment in broad measures of "the" price level. In a sense, the spot market value of the dollar has already declined relative to the deflation of mid-1982, and price indexes are just slow to register that fact. The future rate of inflation will not accelerate because of past growth of M1, however, because that has already been incorporated in the current level of commodity prices. Accelerating future inflation would instead require a future increase in the supply of liquidity that exceeds the unknown future demand.

Misled by measures of the money supply which neglected money demand, the Fed tightened prematurely in the summer of 1975, then failed to tighten adequately from September 1977 through January 1980. The flight from the dollar after 1977 was due to the public's perceptions about current and future monetary policy, not due to lagged effects from previous years. If the Fed will now hold the future value of the dollar reasonably steady, as indicated by the prices of speculative commodities, then any cyclical uptick in broad measures of inflation must be mild and temporary. Prices would tend to converge around a relatively fixed level. There undoubtedly will be times in the next two or three years at which it is appropriate to tighten, but any rise in interest rates would then begin from a level substantially lower than today.●

THE CASE FOR THE IMF

HON. WILLIS D. GRADISON Jr.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the President gave what I consider to be an excellent speech on the world debt situation. I would like to follow up on the President's statement by calling my colleague's attention to an outstanding and thoughtful editorial in this week's issue of The Economist. The title of the editorial is "Needing Those Dollars."

The editorial follows:

[From the Economist, Sept. 24, 1983]

NEEDING THOSE DOLLARS

The United States is the biggest shareholder in the International Monetary Fund. It is acting like one of the smallest. Those visionary Americans who helped in the 1940s to build a world economic system to avoid the mercantilist madness of the 1930s must be in despair about congress's delay in increasing America's contribution to the IMF. Lead, they would say. Nobody else will.

THE $30 BILLION OF EXPORTS, $60 BILLION OF DEBT

The United States has the biggest stake—economic, financial, strategic—in those Latin American countries that the IMF wants to restore to health. The IMF is trying to persuade the governments of Mexico, Brazil and Argentina to change their policies in ways that most North Americans revere—freer markets, smaller budget deficits, fewer subsidies. It is trying to achieve largely American ends by international means, so that Uncle Sam will not carry all the blame for failure while he will benefit vastly from success. Without such changes in policy, the whole of Latin America will slide deeper into debt or, if nobody will lend it more money, into longer stagnation. The United States' exports to Latin America, worth $30 billion in 1982, would slump. Twice that amount owed to American banks would probably go for good. The messy politics of the Graham Greenelands of central America would seem tidy compared with what would happen if Mexico and Brazil started to rumble.

All right, say some congressmen, but the IMF's money is simply going to bail out those foolish American banks that lent $60 billion in the first place. The truth is the reverse. No bank is being bailed out. Unless the IMF gets more cash, most of them soon will be—since no government will allow the domino-like collapse of its banking system that near-simultaneous default by several big debtors would bring.

Individually, each bank knows that its interest lies in getting back what it can from Mexico or Brazil and then quitting. If they all tried to do that, all would be hammered. Debtors would have no incentive to service their loans, knowing they could not expect any more. The IMF stands lonely guard against a rush for the exit. By insisting that the banks go on lending, it is stopping the defaults that would lead either to wholesale bailouts of the banks, financed by the taxpayer in their home countries, or to a scary unknown.

The other reason why America-first congressmen should want to support the IMF has nothing to do with Latin America or Asia or Africa. Quick approval of more money for the fund would do wonders for America's relations with western Europe and Japan. Those allies have long been bored by how America sets its economic policies, through a labyrinth of congressional committees and an ineffectual White House. Boredom becomes frustration, turning to irritation. Why bother with the Americans, say the irritated, if they cannot make up their minds? Why should Europeans support the United States on foreign-policy issues that the White House rates important—sanctions against Russia, missile deployment, peacekeeping in Lebanon—if the support is not returned on economic matters? How come America is capable of prompt economic action which hurts Europe—like President Reagan's recent restrictions on imports of special steels—yet pleads congressional foot-dragging as a convenient excuse for helping little elsewhere?

The same threat hangs over the International Development Association. Ida is the World Bank agency that lends to the poorest countries. The Reagan administration wants to cut Ida's seventh replenishment—Ida-7—to $9 billion over three years, compared with the $12 billion for Ida-6 and the $16 billion that the World Bank wants. Few congressmen see votes in aid for Bangladesh or Mali, and most suspect such aid is wasted anyway. But that view is not shared by America's biggest allies, who are ready to support an Ida-7 of between $12 billion and $16 billion. They have seen the United States lag behind on each of Ida's six replenishments, and they are tired of it.

Bickering among friends is bad at any time. It is positively dangerous at a time when the state of the world economy remains very fragile. Each row feeds the same protectionist instincts that built Fortress America in the 1930s. Those American politicians who welcomed the IMF and the World Bank to Washington in 1946 knew that Fortress America had failed because the rest of the world mattered. May their successors, living in an era when America's trade dependence on the world has trebled and its share of world income halved, remember that lesson and act on it.●

DEFICIT SPENDING: WHAT AMERICA IS UP AGAINST

HON. DENNIS E. ECKART

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. ECKART. Mr. Speaker, I applaud my colleagues, Mr. REGULA of Ohio and Mr. PANETTA of California, for originating the idea for this necessary and timely debate over the unprecedented Federal deficits we are facing. Clearly, the size of the deficits poses a clear and present threat to sound and lasting prosperity, economic growth that everyone shares in equitably.

Mr. REGULA and Mr. PANETTA could not have picked a more appropriate, or opportune, time to take this perplexing and politically troublesome issue off the back burner and put it where it belongs—on the front burner.

In the most articulate of terms Mr. REGULA and Mr. PANETTA have warned us against allowing our resolve to weaken as we come to grips with this most serious problem. Our worst enemy is our complacency. We cannot simply spend our way through recovery to sound economic expansion. We cannot sit idly by and anticipate that our economy, by itself, will outgrow a problem of structural deficits created by an inconsistent and clashing mix of tax, fiscal, and monetary policies. We cannot expect Paul Volcker and the Federal Reserve to come rushing to our rescue. Unfortunately, there is no simple, quick fix to our problem.

Mr. REGULA is entirely correct when he says if we fail to address the problem of large structural deficits we, as a nation, are in danger of consuming our seed corn. If we continue too long to neglect the consequences of $100 to $200 billion deficits we will be guilty of abandoning our responsibility to exercise commonsense and build for a sound and constructive economic future. The harm deficits of this magnitude will cause later is unacceptable. A path of no resistance, no political will or courage to take actions which are obviously going to be politically undesirable, relegates a more painful, more difficult solution to future generations of Americans.

Doing nothing will rob Americans of future job opportunities. Doing nothing leaves too many Americans to toil and search for dignity and the American dream amidst economic uncertainty and stagnation. Doing nothing risks more inflation, more boom-and-bust cycles, beginning each time with more people looking for work and ending each time with ever higher levels of unemployment. Doing nothing virtually guarantees that America will never return to a full employment, full capacity economy and an enduring prosperity.

Most economists agree there is some good medicine and bad medicine in deficit spending. It all depends on the timing and circumstances. Higher Federal spending and lower tax collections in periods of slack in the economy spur demand and help reduce unemployment. We can, in effect, give birth to economic recovery and baby it along up to a certain delicate point. I like to compare it to my father buying a new house. Whether housing money to purchase a new house is worthwhile depends on his ability to service the debt. He must avoid robbing the family budget too much in other necessary areas. That is the good medicine.

If Government spending and tax receipts get too much out of kilter we create excessive demand when the economy is in full recovery and approaching capacity. The result is inflation. The rest of the bad medicine is that deficit spending when the economy is in full bloom creates intense competition and stress in the credit market. Massive Federal borrowing drains too much of our savings. We interrupt private sector investments in new plants, new equipment, and other worthy economic activities. We deny people job opportunities, once again interest rates shoot up, and inflation rears its ugly head. And off we go, again, on a roller coaster ride we have been trying to get off for too many years. Because our per capita savings rate lags behind many other industrialized countries the United States cannot finance its deficits and avoid the undesirable consequences of capital starvation.

For example, higher rates of per capita savings in such countries as Japan and West Germany allow their Governments to finance their deficits without having to absorb a disproportionate share of capital. They are in the enviable position of not having to starve the credit market.

Mr. Volcker, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve, is correct when he characterizes our huge deficits as posing the single most hazardous obstacle to our economic health and well-being. We cannot possibly expect interest rates, for example, to behave in a rational manner if the Government is competing and intruding too heavily in the credit market.

As I mentioned previously, interest rates will defy gravity, surely rising and depressing sectors of our economy that are extremely sensitive to interest rates. We will depress our auto industry at precisely the wrong time. We will depress further an already troubled steel industry. We will depress the rubber industry. We will depress the machine tools and equipment industries. We will depress housing, construction, and, perhaps worst of all, our small businessmen who create a majority of the new jobs in America.

Let us consider for a moment the enormous costs of our defense buildup. The rapid increases in defense spending are going to have to be financed by these deficits. In the long term the elephantine defense buildup is going to have an adverse impact on our economy. You cannot have a first-rate military with a third-rate economy.

Mr. REGULA deserves to be commended for advocating a greater sharing of the defense burden by our allies. We wound our economy too much by bearing an unfair burden of international defense spending. Our allies refuse to help pay their fair share of defense spending from which they benefit so greatly. We loot our economy of capital that should be invested more wisely and humanely in putting Americans back to work. If we cut just $10 billion from the defense budget for next year we could, by allocating that amount in capital to nondefense industries, create 250,000 new and more permanent jobs. We could begin generating new tax receipts at the Federal, State and local levels. We could begin to improve our productivity. We could begin to offset our deficits.

Clearly, it is time to face reality. We have ignored the reality of colliding fiscal and monetary policies for far too long. It is true the recession has added to the deficit problem. But so, too, has enactment of supply-side, trickle-down tax cuts that surrendered too much and resulted in a maldistribution of our wealth. Rosey economic predictions of higher rates of per capita savings and higher rates of investment by the private sector have never been fulfilled.

As I mentioned previously, doing nothing—maintaining the status quo or adopting a politically expedient position—is too risky. No action to lower the deficits keeps the value of the dollar artificially high and locks our export industries out of competitive international markets. Keeping the value of the dollar artificially high helps attract foreign investments. But none of these investments are tied to any strategic or coherent plan that addresses the long-term problems facing America's work force. Doing nothing is no remedy. It locks us into declining productivity. The standard of living for Americans will decline, again.

The real challenge we face is to make the tough political decisions and avoid playing the old political game of the double standard—one standard for those on the right, another for those on the left. We need to put the country on the course of a pay-as-you-go budget. We need to end the divorce of our fiscal and monetary policies. We need to marry them in a manner that begins to trim the deficits and at the same time thwarts the forces of inflation. We need a consensus somewhere in the middle. Each of us who serve in the Congress must engage collectively in the delicate game of political reconciliation if we are to keep America on a path toward genuine prosperity. The sacrifices imposed by our actions must be distributed as evenly as possible. We must not forget that too many of our people who are disadvantaged and out of work already are too isolated from the system.

The political choices are, of course, difficult and uncomfortable. But we must be willing to make them. If we fail to make them we will be inflicting, I believe, irreparable harm on our economy. We will show the American people that we are all too willing to accept the unacceptable—a simple solution of staying neutral, an act that tolerates the withering of Congress as a political institution.

SECRETARY OF STATE SHULTZ' REMARKS ON OUR OBJECTIVES IN LEBANON

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today during the debate on House Joint Resolution 364, legislation pertaining to the war powers resolution authorization in Lebanon, I referred to the statement by Secretary of State George Shultz delivered before our Committee on Foreign Affairs on September 21, 1983. Secretary Shultz spoke in support of the war powers legislation (that is, the bipartisan compromise worked out that House Joint Resolution 364 represents).

I cosponsored and voted for House Joint Resolution 364 which the House passed. The remarks of the Secretary of State in underscoring the need for such legislation, thoughtfully and succinctly analyzed our goals in Lebanon. Accordingly, I request that the full text of the Secretary's statement be inserted at this point in the RECORD:

STATEMENT BY HON. GEORGE P. SHULTZ, SECRETARY OF STATE BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee:

I welcome this chance to talk with you about our objectives in Lebanon and about the importance President Reagan attaches to cooperating with the Congress in pursuit of these objectives.

The challenge in Lebanon is a challenge we face together, as a nation. The issues are not partisan issues. At stake are goals and principles of American foreign policy on which I dare say there is a broad measure of consensus. Whatever legitimate differences there may be over tactics or prerogatives, our leadership in the world is clearly impaired if the President and the Congress attempt to conduct two different foreign policies. We must work together to meet our common, national responsibility or else our common, national interests in the world will suffer. In the last 15 years, there have been instances of deadlock between our two branches of government which resulted in harm to our foreign policy, and human tragedy. The President is determined that this will not be such a case.

This is the spirit in which we approach this problem, and I am heartened by the similiar spirit I have seen in the Congress. As President Reagan said yesterdy, we support the bipartisan leadership agreement that has been reached. This agreement, in my view, serves the national interest.

Let me explain the Administration's view of what is at stake in the Middle East, and in Lebanon; what our diplomacy is attempting to accomplish there; and why the presence of our Marines has been of enormous importance.

OUR POLICY IN THE MIDDLE EAST

It is almost ten years since the October 1973 war, and for the past decade the United States has been vigorously and almost continuously engaged in Middle East diplomacy.

Given our strong moral and political commitment to Israel and our many strong friendships in the Arab world, we have always perceived that a negotiated solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict was in the national interest of the United States. Israel and its Arab neighbors deserve to live in peace and security; the Palestinian people deserve a just solution to their legitimate rights and aspirations; all the nations of the region deserve a future free of external intervention or superpower confrontation.

The road to peace is long and hard, and we have no illusions about it. But we can be proud of the role our country has played in bringing about many significant steps toward peace in the past 10 years.

Just over a year ago, President Reagan addressed himself to the broader questions of Middle East peace in a major initiative, which offered—and still offers—the most practical and workable and hopeful basis for negotiation. Anyone in the Middle East who truly seeks a just, secure, and comprehensive solution to the conflict will have to turn in the direction of the President's initiative, firmly grounded as it is in the Camp David Accords and UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338.

The crisis in Lebanon cannot be isolated from the larger Middle East crisis. It involves many of the same parties concerned with the broader issues of Middle East peace. It involves similar questions of security, respect for sovereignty, and peaceful settlement of disputes. To advance toward a peaceful solution in Lebanon will contribute to the broader peace process; setbacks in Lebanon will make the broader effort that much harder.

OUR OBJECTIVES AND POLICY IN LEBANON

Our objectives in Lebanon have, from the beginning, been essentially threefold:

The withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon;

A sovereign independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout its national territory; and Security for Israel's northern border, so that the inhabitants of northern Israel can live in safety and without fear of artillery and rocket attacks.

The objectives are not changing. They are, and have been, a constant of our policy. The latest outbreak of fighting should not cause us to lose sight of them.

Lebanon is a proud and beautiful country, whose people have contributed much to the world. Yet it has also had a complex and turbulent history. The roots of enmity in that country go very deep indeed. Nevertheless, for many years Lebanon thrived because political rivalries were accommodated and a delicate balance maintained. Our country too suffered a tragic civil war, but we survived and overcame it. The people of Lebanon remember a happier time when their nation was a dynamic, progressive, and prosperous democracy. The yearning for peace, too, runs deep in Lebanon.

With the end of the terrible ordeal of Beirut last summer and the election of President Amin Gemayel shortly thereafter, it appeared that Lebanon would get a second chance after all.

Almost all of Lebanon's many confessional groups pledged their loyalty to their new leader and seemed ready to bury their differences in the name of political and economic renewal. War damage was quickly being removed from Beirut and reconstruction seemed well underway.

To consolidate this hopeful beginning, it was clear that Lebanon had, as a matter of top priority, to see to the withdrawal of all non-Lebanese armed forces from its soil. Whatever indigenous barriers to national reconciliation the Lebanese may face and however prepared they may be to overcome them if given a chance, that process can never really get underway so long as Lebanon remains occupied by foreign armies, foreign paramilitary forces, and foreign terrorist groups. The United States responded favorably to the request of the Lebanese government—and of many of our Arab friends—to help Lebanon and Israel reach an agreement that would be a first step toward this objective. Israel was prepared to withdraw, and Lebanon was willing to negotiate an agreement that also met Israel's legitimate need for security on its northern border. After lengthy negotiations, and with a great deal of goodwill on both sides, Lebanon and Israel reached such an agreement on May 17.

In parallel with this effort, we put our weight behind President Gemayel's movement toward political accommodation * * *. On August 31, President Gemayel, with his Council of Ministers, issued a call for key Lebanese leaders to join in a dialog on a new national approach to reconciliation and unity. He has made clear his willingness to broaden the base and composition of his government to reflect a true sharing of power. This is a policy we have strongly urged, supported, and assisted, and we have no doubt of President Gemayel's sincerity. Ambassadors Robert McFarlane and Richard Fairbanks have devoted considerable time and effort to this enterprise, as has Saudi Arabia.

The problem, of course, has been Syria. The two tracks of Lebanon's policy—foreign troop withdrawal, and national reconciliation—have both been blocked by Syria, which has been heavily rearmed by the Soviet Union since Syria's defeats in battle last summer. No one questions Syria's legitimate security concerns with respect to Lebanon. But Syria, unlike Israel, has been unwilling to negotiate with Lebanon over how to reconcile its security concerns with Lebanon's sovereign right to follow its own path. The question arises whether Syria's aim is to assure its security or assure its domination of Lebanon:

Syria now has the largest army in Lebanon, but it has refused to negotiate the withdrawal of its forces, reneging on repeated pledges that it would do so once the Israelis did.

Syria has persisted in this course even in defiance of the Lebanese government's formal requests at the beginning of September to Syria, the PLO, and the Arab League that all external forces withdraw. Israel has stated its unwillingness to withdraw totally as long as Syrian forces are there; thus Syria is in the ironic position of keeping Israeli forces in Lebanon. Syria is also permitting the reentry of armed Palestinian groups into the Aleyh/Shuf area in violation of the agreements reached through Ambassador Habib's mediation last year.

At the same time, Syria is using its leverage within Lebanon to obstruct the process of national reconciliation. Indeed, Syria has instigated political opposition within Lebanon and armed several factions engaged in military actions against the legitimate government.

Therefore, the immediate focus of our diplomacy, conducted by Ambassadors McFarlane and Fairbanks, is a creasefire between the various groups in Lebanon. Saudi Arabia has been actively pursuing the same goal. Jordan, Egypt, and other friendly Arab countries have been very supportive of these diplomatic efforts.

The outcome of this negotiation, as of any negotiation, will depend on the balance of forces. Those who seek to improve their position by force will probably not agree to a ceasefire until they run up against a stalemate on the battlefield.

This brings me to the military situation, and to the role of the Multinational force now in Lebanon, which includes, as you know, approximately 1,200 United States Marines on the ground in the Beirut area.

THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE AND THE U.S. MARINES

A year ago, President Reagan dispatched these Marines to participate in the Multinational Force requested by the government of Lebanon. The presence of this force was designed to help ensure the Lebanese government's sovereignty and authority; it was also intended to further that government's efforts to assure the safety of people in the area and to end the violence that had tragically recurred in the massacres of Sabra and Shatila.

British, French, and Italian forces are serving alongside our Marines, and thus the MNF is a truly multilateral, cooperative effort. Its task is a peacekeeping mission, not a warfighting mission.

Its job is not to take sides in a war, but, on the contrary, to help provide a sense of security for the legitimate government of Lebanon as it pursues its national sovereignty and national unity. Most of the key confessional groups and friendly Arab countries supported this role for the MNF when it was sent to Lebanon, and they continue to support this role.

Now the MNF is under challenge by those apparently determined to prevent an internal political accommodation. The President has augmented US Naval support forces offshore and has authorized US forces to exercise their right of self-defense should attacks on them continue. Our MNF partners have taken similar or other measures to assure security and self-defense.

We are concerned that key strategic positions in the vicinity of Beirut, which are vital to the safety of our Marines, of other American military and diplomatic personnel, and to the security of Beirut, have recently come under attack. We have responded to these attacks in order to protect our personnel, and will continue to do so. General Kelley will be able to discuss the military situation in greater detail.

A ceasefire, as I have suggested, will come about only when all parties conclude it is in their interest.

Our strategy in Lebanon is to help create conditions that will make it in everyone's interest—to help produce a kind of equilibrium which will encourage a ceasefire, a political accommodation, and ultimately the withdrawal of all foreign forces. We are seeking to build a structure of stability, on the following pillars:

The first element is political negotiations to bring about national reconciliation within Lebanon, to ease or resolve the internal rivalries and mutual suspicions that are at the heart of Lebanon's agony. The United States has strongly supported this endeavor. We are also concerned for the safety of the Palestinian civilians in Lebanon.

The second element is diplomacy to organize international support for the legitimate government of Lebanon, for its efforts at reconciliation, and for a ceasefire. The United States is actively engaged in this effort.

In the military dimension, the primary responsibility rests on the Lebanese Armed Forces, which have acquitted themselves well. We have helped train and equip these forces, and we are pleased that these forces have been reconstituted * * *. An army that would be more than adequate for its mission of keeping order once foreign forces were removed, however, is now understandably under severe pressures because it is under assault by forces protected, armed, and encouraged by Syria. It is the external, non-Lebanese involvement that is enormously exacerbating the problem.

Israel continues to have influence with many groups in Lebanon, and has an interest in encouraging national reconciliation and stability. Events north of the Awwali River must be of concern to it, since its long-term security cannot but be affected by Syrian and PLO dominance of the rest of Lebanon.

The MNF, including our Marines, provide an added measure of stability in the overall equation, as I have described.

Our Marines, or the MNF as a whole, cannot tip the balance of forces alone—and it is not their mission to do so. But their presence remains one cruical pillar of the structure of stability. As a former Marine, I will not allow anyone to cast doubt on how formidable even this small number of Marines can be.

They are an important deterrent, a symbol of the international backing behind the legitimate government of Lebanon, and an important weight in the scales. To remove the Marines would put both the government, and what we are trying to achieve, in jeopardy.

This is why our domestic controversy over war powers has been disturbing. The uncertainty about the American commitment only weakens our effectiveness; doubts about our staying power can only cause the aggressors to discount our presence—or to intensify their attacks, in hopes of hastening our departure. An accommodation between the President and Congress to resolve this dispute will help dispel those doubts about our staying power and strengthen our hand.

The Executive and Legislative Branches, as you know, have important differences of principle with respect to the War Powers Resolution. The Executive Branch has traditionally had questions about the requirement of Congressional authorization for Presidential disposition of our armed forces, both in light of the President's Commander-in-Chief power and on practical grounds. Congress, of course, has had a different view. We could not expect to resolve this basic difference definitively now, but the Administration has been prepared to consider practical proposals that enabled us to protect our common, national interest in Lebanon without prejudging our respective positions on the basic issue of principle.

In this regard, we are gratified that an agreement has been reached among the bipartisan leadership of the Congress to introduce and seek to enact a resolution authorizing the continued presence and mission of the U.S. peacekeeping forces in Lebanon. As the President stated yesterday, although he has substantial reservations about parts of this resolution, he would be willing to sign the proposed resolution while expressing those reservations. We are especially pleased that the proposed resolution not only supports our policies in Lebanon, but now enables us to advance our national interests on the solid bipartisan basis that has been the traditional hallmark of American foreign policy.

WHAT IS AT STAKE IN LEBANON

At stake in Lebanon are some basic principles of international law and international morality that have wider relevance for American foreign policy:

At stake is a small country's right to decide for itself how to achieve its sovereign objectives, free from outside pressure, threat, or blackmail.

At stake is the principle that international disputes should be settled by peaceful means, not by the use or threat of force.

At stake also are some concerns that affect our national interest and the security of our friends and allies. If American efforts for peaceful solutions are overwhelmed by brute force, our role is that much weakened everywhere. Friends who rely on us will be disheartened, and will be that much less secure. Moderates in the Arab world whom we are encouraging to take risks for peace will feel it far less safe to do so. The Soviet Union's efforts to disrupt our diplomacy will have scored a victory; radical and rejectionist elements will be strengthened. The cause of peace and justice will have suffered a setback. Israel's security on its northern border will be weakened.

What we are doing in Lebanon is right. There are risks involved, but any important undertaking involves risks. If we want the role and influence of a great power, we have to accept the responsibilities of a great power. Many millions of people around the world look to us as the strongest defender of freedom, justice, and peace; we cannot walk away from responsibilities without paying a moral and political price.

I prefer to look at it positively: After all the experience of the last 15 years, nothing would give more reassurance and hope to all our friends in the world than to see the President and Congress working in harmony, united behind a strong and purposeful national policy. This is our opportunity now. We cannot afford to let it slip away.●

TREASURY RESPONDS TO CRBR ALTERNATIVE FUNDING PLAN

HON. JOE SKEEN

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. SKEEN. Mr. Speaker, several congressional reviews of the administration's proposed alternative financing plan for the Clinch River breeder reactor have been offered or are in progress. Of particular concern to several Members has been the allegation by the project opponents that the private sector financing plan gives unprecedented tax advantages to private investors and lenders that would appear as a financial loss to the Government. I wish to provide for the RECORD a letter to Mr. Shelby Brewer, Assistant Secretary for Nuclear Energy of the Department of Energy, from Mr. John Chapoton, Assistant Secretary for Tax Policy, Department of the Treasury, that effectively refutes these allegations. Mr. Chapoton responds to three questions that relate to tax policy matters in joint Government/industry ventures. The Treasury concludes that there could be no financial loss to the Government incurred from the alternative plan. Indeed, with the private sector selling the Clinch River power at market rates, the Treasury concludes that "there would be a gain to the Government."

The letter follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D.C., September 14, 1983.

Hon. SHELBY T. BREWER,
Assistant Secretary for Nuclear Energy, Department of Energy, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BREWER: Thank you for your letter asking the Treasury Department's analysis of the revenue impact of the Clinch River Breeder Reactor Project. Your letter presents three technical questions, which I will answer directly.

(1) Q. In respect to the tax policy considerations involved in H.R. 3110, is there a difference between cases (a) where the government uses the output of the property and (b) where, as here, the output is sold into the private market?

A. Yes, because H.R. 3110, the Pickle Bill, deals with assets used by governments, and the use of services by governments. By contrast, the power generating assets of the Project would be used for private purposes. If the Pickle Bill were applied to this kind of situation, consumers would either have to pay higher than market price (which is unlikely) or the private investors would not invest as much and the government would have to stand the difference.

(2) Q. Assuming operating costs are equal and electric output and prices the same, is there any net loss to the government from moving ownership of a part of the project from the government sector into the private sector, as described?

A. No, although there may be some change in the timing of costs borne by the public and private sectors.

(3) Q. Assuming operating costs an equal but that the private owners would, as described, invest an amount which reflects the expectation that they sell the output for more than could the government, is there any gain or loss to the government?

A. There would be a gain to the government. Consumers would be covering costs in the price which the government would otherwise have to cover in expenditures.

Please understand that Treasury makes no judgment about which of the hypothetical cases in questions (2) and (3) is likely to prevail, nor do we draw any conclusions about the desirability of the project from the point of view of private investors. We do not, however, foresee any offsetting losses to the government resulting from private rather than public financing.

Sincerely,

JOHN E. CHAPOTON,
Assistant Secretary (Tax Policy).●

THE LANGUAGE OF THE FEDERAL BUDGET

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, the Federal budget has become so steeped in economic jargon that it has become unintelligible to all but a few experts. The budget is written in a mind-numbing, bureaucratic language that conceals rather than reveals where and why we are spending the taxpayers' money. It is hardly a document that encourages democratic participation.

Celia Eckhardt, former director of the IPS Washington School and editor of Change magazine, discusses the language of the Federal budget and its antidemocratic character in a paper she wrote for a new institute budget study, that 60 member of Congress have requested. The study is part of a series following the publication of the 1978 study entitled, "The Federal Budget and Social Reconstruction." I recommend this essay to my colleagues.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE FEDERAL BUDGET

(By Celia Eckhardt)

The federal budget is a central ethical statement about American society. It tells what we collectively believe is worth paying for, suggesting our values by showing what proportion of our federal monies we spend for war, what for art, what for health, and so on. Since language is our most distinctively human expression, the language of the budget ought itself to be revealing. And when we look carefully at that language to find out what it can tell us about our society and the way it works, we discover indeed that it poses a threat—not merely to our need for grace, but to our essential humanity.

It was in 1949, in his appendix to "1984," that George Orwell described the language of the future as "Newspeak". It was Orwell's purpose to show how the pursuit of power led to the corruption of language, and although the language of our federal budget is not quite what he describes in that chilling fantasy, many of its characteristics have been realized. Clarity is not a virtue to these authors, nor precision of meaning, nor the evocation of historical context. "The intention," Orwell wrote of Newspeak, "was to make speech, and especially speech on any subject not ideologically neutral, as nearly as possible independent of consciousness."

We must also notice, as Orwell did, the abundant use of alphabetical designations. Observing that since the early twentieth century, telescoped words and phrases have been characteristic of our political language, particularly in totalitarian countries, Orwell realized that such abbreviations narrowed and subtly altered the title or phrase's meaning, cutting out most of the associations we might have had with it and leaving a reference with no human resonance. GNP therefore stands for the accumulated work of men and women. SBA refers to the coming together of people determined to work as nearly as they can by and for themselves. In these instances, everything human has been subtracted from the nearly universal experience of work, leaving us with no more than a squiggle of letters. People have been reduced to things. "Ultimately," Orwell wrote, "it was hoped to make articulate speech issue from the larynx without involving the higher brain centers at all."

The result of all this is to discourage people from knowing, much less understanding, what our society at its center is all about. It is to discourage them from trying to affect their world, because that word "affect" is essentially related to feelings: in one of its forms it appears as "affection." The language of the federal budget dulls all feelings. It obscures the fact that it is the product of individual human decisions inherently capable of being changed. It is wholly the product of the modern bureaucratic state, and it evokes no great modernist so much as Franz Kafka, who described a world in which doors open onto nothing; windows are blank; and corridors lead nowhere but to confusion.

Such a state of affairs is relatively recent and has causes—some of them obvious and some, obscure. This deterioration of language, so far as the federal budget is concerned, began sometime after the Second World War. Since the first budget message in 1921, the document has changed from a straightforward account of the government's finances—a kind of giant family account book with explanations where necessary—into an intensely political statement impossible to take at face value.

On December 5, 1921, President Warren G. Harding signed the message to accompany the budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923. The message, including a chart of total receipts and expenditures, took up about three-quarters of a page. Harding recommended legislation releasing funds held by the Navy Department that would nearly cancel the $150 million deficit. The figures in the budget proper estimated the amount of money to be spent for listed items such as streetcar tickets, lace leather, the washing and hemming of towels and the removal of rubbish. * * *

It was of course the Great Depression that forced Americans to contemplate the proper role of the federal government, and the relationship between money and wealth. * * * In his 1936 budget message, Roosevelt gave two reasons for changing the document's form, one of them being that he wanted to "improve the usefulness of document from the citizen's standpoint." Apart from the occasional phrase that revealed the flair of the man, the language remained the same as it had been for twenty years. It was language that intended to be clear and asked to be understood. Roosevelt ended by stating his three major objectives: "(1) The normal functions of the United States Government can be carried on with economy and a high standard of efficiency, (2) the broad obligation of the Government to use all proper efforts to prevent destitution can be maintained under more practical methods than we are using at present, and (3) the excellent credit of the Government will be maintained for the common good."

When he submitted his budget for 1939, Roosevelt took the occasion to give the nation a gracious, if brief, lecture on the budget process, which he prefaced by saying, "In simple fairness to the Treasury of the United States, I am confident that the Congress and the public will bear in mind certain fundamentals relating to the making of the National Budget." He went on to explain how far in advance the estimates had to be made, and to insist that the government's experts "are at least of equal competence with the experts of the largest banks and industrial corporations of the United States." He invited people to make sense of the document, though he pointed to a process experts necessarily managed. His message was only fifteen pages long, and the document as a whole well under 1,000.

After the war the language of the budget became increasingly convoluted and politically charged, and its length grew apace. By 1954 the president's message was fifty-five pages, and the budget document had an appendix separately printed that was 492 pages. By 1960 the president's message had grown to seventy-eight pages, and by 1968 the appendix ended on page 1,316. In the introduction to the appendix of 1954, three terms were briefly defined. By 1975 we were offered a separate, eleven-page pamphlet defining seventy-five different terms. By 1975, too, the single document of the Roosevelt era had grown to four separate books, one of them featuring seventeen special analyses of matters such as research and development, federal aid to state and local governments, and environmental protection. Roosevelt's hope of making the budget useful "from the citizen's standpoint" had become a casualty of history.

The obvious explanation for the document's growing like Alice after she had drunk from the second bottle is that the federal government has taken an increasingly larger role in the nation's affairs. In 1930 federal spending accounted for only three percent of the national income. The projected figures for 1982 are a record twenty-four percent.

The obvious explanation for the arcane nature of the budget language is that we have given ourselves over to experts. And however inevitable this abdication of citizenship, it creates a situation that is dangerous to whatever claims America has to being the democracy I was brought up to believe it was. I would suggest, further, that the objuscations have yet another source, which lies in the failure of our political system to decide on the role of the federal government, and to define more clearly the relationship between money and wealth.

In 1944, in his annual message to Congress, Franklin Roosevelt proposed a new Economic Bill of Rights that included the "right to a useful and remunerative job in the industries or shops or farms or mines of the Nation." The full employment bill of 1945 declared accordingly that all Americans "able to work and seeking work have the right to useful, remunerative, regular, and full-time employment." The bill passed the Senate by an impressive 71 to 10. The Roosevelt Administration and the United States Senate had in effect declared that labor was wealth and that the federal government had an obligation to see that wealth was not wasted. The House saw matters differently, however, gutting important parts of the bill so that the Employment Act of 1946, according to Louis Fisher of the Congressional Research Service, "meant all things to all people." It was full of ambiguity. It was vague. It inclined to cant.

The political distance between two beliefs had become so great there was apparently no reconciling them. On one side were those who believed that the commonweal depended upon the free enterprise principle: we must allow those who can to make as much money as they choose because in the process of doing that they will create a world in which everyone else has an appropriate, albeit sometimes a difficult place. On the other side were those who believed that human societies are human constructions—not the arbitrary result of abstract "laws of the marketplace" or "supply and demand"—and that the whole is responsible for the parts.* * *

In 1946, the very year that the American Congress passed an employment act that men and women could interpret as they chose, George Orwell was writing, "In our time, political speech and writings are large the defense of the indefensible . . . political language has to consist largely of euphemism, question-begging and sheer cloudy vagueness." The inflation of language, Orwell thought, became itself a kind of euphemism. "The great enemy of clear language is insincerity," he wrote. "When there is a gap between one's real and one's declared aims, one turns as it were instinctively to long words and exhausted idioms, like a cuttlefish squirting out ink.

There are of course less theoretical and no doubt more germane ways of looking at the problem of speaking clearly on the subject of wealth. In the early 1960s, after more than a decade of national affluence, responsible men estimated the numbers of the poor in America at between thirty-two and fifty million people, or between twenty and twenty-five percent of the population. According to Michael Harrington, the wealthiest twenty percent of American families garnered forty-five and a half percent of the total family income. Such figures suggest that the language of free enterprise, however respectable its Enlightenment origins, had been used by those with financial and therefore cultural power to hold a dramatically disproportionate share of the national resources. Whether they had used it cynically or innocently is irrelevant. the language of raw power, like that of greed, makes most of us uncomfortable, and it is a relief to take refuge in philosophies that minimize human agency.

Another of the political realities that encouraged the postwar double-speak was the conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union. As Harry Truman put it in his message accompanying the 1954 budget, "In areas outside of Europe there are many friendly nations, containing nearly half of the earth's population and much of its material wealth, which are struggling against conditions that threaten their continued existence as free nations." Truman and his successors preferred to use the language of freedom to build intransigence against "the threat of communist imperialism," rather than to talk about the material wealth to which Americans were determined to retain access, no matter whether the foreign country that contained it were a despotism. "Free" came to be used selectively: it referred for the most part to countries that did not call themselves communist and that maintained friendly relations with the United States. Truman talked of our vital contributions to the strength of the free world without reference to the political character of our foreign allies: witness his satisfaction in our help to the colonialist French "and the Associated States of Viet Nam, Laos, and Cambodia in their fight against a powerful, communist-led revolt." The tenuousness of such claims began to require an unprecedented effort at persuasion.

For the first time in the history of presidential preface, Dwight Eisenhower's message trumpeting the 1960 budget was overt salesmanship. On the first page he listed its virtues in one-through-five fashion: it was balanced; it was responsible; it was confident; it was positive; it was attainable. The avuncular Eisenhower style turned out to be for the most part boilerplate: the nation would "move forward strongly and confidently"; we had to "help friendly nations foster their development"; we had to encourage economic growth and stability." He talked of the "mutual security program" designed "to meet the Communist threat and to help improve the standard of living of people in less developed nations." By now we are so inured to this kind of language that it may be hard to realize how recent is its vintage. As Orwell suggested, there has been a gap between our real and our delcared aims, and the result has been an exhausted idiom.

Falling easily into his predecessors' "defense of freedom against aggression" and the "search for international peace and cooperation," Lyndon Johnson's budget messages were even more deeply mired in self-aggrandizement and double-speak. In January 1967, he referred to $5.8 billion for Vietnam and other national defense outlays (emphasis mine). He declared that the "aims of our society" would be jeopardized by levying new taxes to pay for the war, a refusal now generally credited with beginning today's dangerous levels of inflation. Putting on the hard sell for which he had become notorious, he bragged of cutting "waste and nonessentials" and of scorning the "soft, easy answers to critical problems."

Richard Nixon, at the same time he was authorizing wiretaps of people in the White House and throughout the country, wrote in his 1975 budget message of "private citizens endowed with civil liberties that are secure from governmental encroachment," and of strengthening the role of the individual in American society. The absence of sincerity, as Orwell taught us to see, fathered the familiar succession of mindless phrases: "vigorous leadership," "flexible response," "effective performance," "unnecessary restrictions." We were to restore a proper balance of individual and governmental power. We were to revitalize individual initiative. And so on.

The fuzziness in Jimmy Carter's language came additionally from the fact that he and the people he brought to the White House seemed unable to decide on priorities. "The Federal Government," he said in his message accompanying the 1979 budget, "has an obligation to nurture and protect our environment." In the next paragraph, he wrote "The Federal Government must lead the way in investing in the Nation's technological future." A little further, he said "Public needs are critically important; but private needs are equally valid . . ." Therefore he and those who wrote for him devoted a good deal of money and rhetoric to putting matters off. The Energy Department, for example, enjoyed "a high-priority commitment to the completion of a thorough analysis." He wrote of establishing commissions and evaluating the current and future problems of whatever issue was at hand. Next year, he said, he would submit legislation about national health insurance. Meanwhile, America would be protected against foreign aggression and a favorable military balance would be preserved with the Soviet Union.

So Ronald Reagan's budget is the most recent of an established, if brief, tradition of documents constructed with dead prose, cliche, jargon, and euphemism. The peculiar barbarity of Reaganspeak slips easily into a context of language already stripped of most of its humanity and clarity. Reagan, however, is self-congratulatory and polemical to a degree unprecedented. Introducing the 1983 budget, he begins, "One year ago, in my first address to the country, I went before the American people to report on the condition of our economy. It was not a happy occasion." Those who oppose him seek instant relief and panaceas. He, on the other hand, refuses to promise the American people a miracle, but does promise them progress. Proposing that we "clean up this mess," he titles the second section of his message "A Year of Historic Achievement" and the third "No Time to Retreat." He concludes, "We must, in the end, roll up our sleeves, face our responsibilities squarely, and persevere at the unending task of setting, and keeping, the Nation's affairs in order." A triumph of banality, this is a language for those who have no historical memory and who refuse either to think or to feel. It is a triumph of image-making.

When Reagan wrote his preface to the budget, just under ten million men and women in the richest nation the world had ever seen needed to work and could not find jobs. For a government enjoined by its Constitution to "promote the general welfare," justifying that fact requires convolutions of thought and language of no meager order. It is one thing for a French monarch to say "Apres moi, le deluge," and prove himself right. It is quite another for a nation that declares itself to be of, by, and for the people to claim unalterable laws of economic behavior as a reason to look on while large numbers of people lack the means to sustain life decently.

But even in the more technical part of the federal budget, Reagan's scriptwriters are abstract and ideological: "Excessive intervention in the economy by the Federal Government," they say, has "resulted in major disruptions and imbalances and a virtual end to economic growth." Nothing in Reagan's budget message indicates that he knows the human cost of the program he says will eventually benefit all Americans, or that he understands or regrets who will pay it. He makes no reference to unemployment, and uses the term "jobless" only once. Franklin Roosevelt had wanted to "prevent destitution" and use government resources

"for the common good," and he clearly understood the difference between wealth and money. Reagan's four stated purposes refer to things rather than to people. For him, money apparently is wealth. His goals are to reduce federal spending and federal regulations, to reduce personal and business taxes, and to support "a moderate and steady monetary policy." He says, "The correction of previous fiscal and monetary excesses has come too late to avert an unwelcome, painful, albeit temporary business slump (emphasis mine)."

Brave are the critics who force themselves to endure and interpret this language because they know that American abundance can be used to nourish rather than divide our people, and to help rather than cripple our neighbors. But the enemy of those who deal with such language is a more insidious enemy than the bad man in the westerns. It threatens them because it makes them use its dehumanizing tools. Joseph Conrad said: into the destructive element immerse yourself. The struggle to maintain one's humanity in this element is an essentially modern struggle, and one that is central to the survivial of democracy. Language out of touch with hope and human experience masks the choice we have to live more just and more generous lives.●

THE ADMINISTRATION AND CIVIL RIGHTS: THE FIRST THOUSAND DAYS

HON. JAMES M. SHANNON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks there has been a great deal of public debate and comment focused on the record of the Reagan administration in the area of civil rights. In the September 24, 1983, issue of America, our former colleague, Robert Drinan, S.J., accurately describes the stagnation of the enforcement of existing civil rights laws that has been imposed by this administration and exposes the deficient legal underpinnings of its policies in this area.

I commend to all my colleagues who appreciate the importance of removing institutional barriers to equal opportunity, a goal this body sought to advance through the civil rights legislation and who have witnessed the failure of this administration in its responsibility to the powerless, this thoughtfully articulated piece by Father Drinan.

The article follows:

THE ADMINISTRATION AND CIVIL RIGHTS: THE FIRST THOUSAND DAYS

(By Robert F. Drinan)

A counterrevolution in the area of civil rights has been launched in the 34 months of the Reagan Administration. For the first time the bipartisan consensus that has existed in civil rights since at least the Eisenhower Administration has been fragmented.

This development was not unpredictable since Mr. Reagan has always been opposed to the government and the law establishing and enforcing goals of equal opportunity. In 1964 he opposed the enactment of the Federal Civil Rights law; only 6 Republican Senators and 34 Republican Members of the House agreed with that position. Mr. Reagan, moreover, also opposed the fair housing bill proposed in 1966 in California. In 1980 he insisted that the Republican platform adopted in Detroit disapprove of busing for the purposes of racial integration and ban quotas designed to increase the number of minorities in schools or businesses.

The whole world is watching to see the extent to which the long held consensus on civil rights can be harmed. The Economist, a conservative British weekly that supports the President, noted as early as September 1981 that the Reagan Administration was seeking to alter something fundamental in civil rights. The Economist predicted that the results would have immense repercussions all around the world since many nations have written into their own law the civil rights laws enacted by the Congress in the 1960's.

The moral dimensions are, of course, obvious. The Second Vatican Council in its pastoral on "The Church in the Modern World" has these striking words: "With respect to the fundamental rights of the person, every type of discrimination, whether social or cultural, whether based on sex, race, color, social condition, language or religion, is to be overcome and eradicated as contrary to God's intent." This section is clearly an endorsement of legislation since it refers to an issue of public morality and calls for the "eradication" of any form of discrimination.

It is not easy to pinpoint the precise premises on civil rights on which the Reagan Administration operates. In reaction to the vehement and almost daily criticism of the 165 public interest groups that make up the Leadership Conference, spokesmen for the Reagan Administration have retreated from their position and altered their premises. But the core position of the Reagan Justice Department appears to be an insistence that a specific intent to discriminate be demonstrated before relief is granted and that nothing may be ordered or even permitted by the law which by affirmative action takes benefits away from members of the majority. These two positions are at odds with the statutory and decisional law that has developed over the past generation. But the assistant attorney general for civil rights, William Bradford Reynolds, justifies them by referring to the 1980 Republican platform. Civil rights activists are surprised and saddened by such a justification, since up to the time of the Reagan Administration it had always been assumed that the enforcement of civil rights was an issue above politics and one that derived from the post-Civil War amendments to the Constitution and the manner in which the Congress and the courts have implemented these guarantees.

No one denies that there are difficult questions as to the extent to which affirmative action can be employed without bringing about reverse discrimination. But the Reagan Justice Department is opposed even to voluntary agreements by which minority workers can be given a certain preference for the duration of a specific period of time. Such an arrangement was approved in 1979 by the U.S. Supreme Court, in a 5-to-2 decision, United Steelworkers v. Weber. Brian Weber, a white worker, claimed that he was discriminated against by a plan collectively bargained for by his union and his employer that reserved for black employees 50 percent of the openings in a craft training program until the percentage of black craft workers in the plant was commensurate with the percentage of blacks in the local labor force. The court held that this voluntary approach did not violate Title 7 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The dissent of Justice William Rehnquist and Chief Justice Warren Burger argued that Congress intended to forbid all voluntary race-conscious affirmative action. It is that dissent that the Justice Department has now made into its official and vigorously defended position. The Justice Department is now seeking to impose that point of view in a New Orleans case where the lower court had approved a voluntary race-conscious arrangement to increase the number of minorities in the police force.

The doctrinaire condemnation by the Justice Department of all color-conscious distinctions in employment has caused extensive confusion among employers, government officials and labor leaders, all of whom desire to redress racial imbalance by remedies that provide not rigid quotas but attainable goals and targets. In many industries programs agreed to in good faith to utilize race-conscious affirmative action have now been abandoned or put on hold.

If the Justice Department is convinced that all affirmative action plans based on race-conscious considerations are wrong it could, of course, ask the Congress to make that clear. It has not attempted to do so, knowing that Congress is not likely to reverse the findings of the Weber decision or condemn the vast array of legal and administrative techniques designed to redress massive discrimination in the past. Indeed Congress would have to condemn years of work by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (E.E.O.C.) and other Federal agencies that have carefully worked out plans to alter the colorblind attitudes that have resulted in the denial to minorities of their right to promotion and seniority. Congress is not likely, in other words, to set aside the positive and very successful techniques discovered by Federal agencies to carry out the objectives of those monumental civil rights laws overwhelmingly enacted by the Congress on a nonpartisan basis. For Congress knows that the existence of pervasive discrimination based on race can be corrected only by sophisticated techniques of recognizing race for benign purposes and using color-consciousness to rectify patterns of discrimination in the past.

Despite this fact the Justice Department continues to deny or to restrict the applicability of affirmative action to housing, education, employment and other areas in which the Federal Government has long maintained a vigorous program to bring about desegregation.

Why the Reagan Administration and the Justice Department continue to be adamant in pressing for a position not authorized by Congress or the courts is not entirely clear. Some extreme conservatives who have access to decision makers in the Administration no doubt want to resist or reverse racial gains. The intense pressure on the Administration to stop busing, furthermore, has apparently prompted the Administration to develop legal principles for that area which logically they have to extend to other situations. The commitment, moreover, of continued opposition to the Equal Rights Amendment may require in the mind of Administration spokesmen that all sex-conscious and race-conscious distinctions be disowned. But whatever the cause for the reversal by the Reagan Administration of convictions previously held on a bipartisan basis, the results as seen by the civil rights community have been catastrophic.

The negative attitude of the Administration toward curbing discrimination in housing typifies the reluctance to use the law to bring about equality of opportunity. In 1980, the House passed a bill tightening up the porous 1968 Fair Housing bill. The measure failed in the Senate. Civil rights activists thought that Samuel Pierce, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development and the only black person in the Cabinet, might take advantage of the extensive work already done on the Fair Housing bill and move a bill banning bias in the sale or rental of housing. But it was not until mid-1983 that the Reagan Administration finally sent a fair housing measure to Congress. It was, however, a bill that was too weak to gain the support of even the Republicans who had endorsed a stronger measure sponsored by the Leadership Conference and filed by Senator Charles Mathias (R., Md.). That means, in effect, that it is unlikely that any fair housing bill will pass the 98th Congress.

There are comparable developments on other issues. The White House withheld its endorsement of the Voting Rights Act until it was obvious that it was going to clear the Senate. The Administration has filed a brief in the Supreme Court reversing prior policy and declaring that Title 9 of the 1972 Education Act that bans sex bias applies only to those programs specifically funded by the Federal Government. Grove City College in Pennsylvania claimed freedom from Federal regulations because it receives no Government money except the Federal aid which its students receive. To the astonishment of Senator Robert Dole (R., Kan.) and many others, the Solicitor General has agreed with Grove City College. If he prevails, the result will be that the ban on sex discrimination will apply to only 4 percent of the $13 billion which goes annually to higher education. Again the Administration could easily ask the Congress to clarify its intent if, as is claimed, the intent of Congress is ambiguous. But, as in the case of Bob Jones University, the Administration argues for a narrow view of civil rights without asking the Congress to broaden the scope and coverage of the law in question. The results is that inevitably the Administration appears to be taking the side of those who do not want the Federal Government to broaden the opportunities for minorities or for women.

In one instance, however, the Justice Department has elected to endorse an expansive view of a Federal law. Elizabeth Hishon spent seven years as an attorney in the Atlanta firm of King and Spalding, the former firm of Griffin Bell, Attorney General in the Carter Administration. Mrs. Hishon was not granted partnership in the firm and will argue her case before the United States Supreme Court in the near future. Her former firm will argue that the Civil Rights Act reaches corporations but not partnerships which, it is claimed, are by nature private, almost familial. The Justice Department has agreed with Mrs. Hishon, for reasons which seem inconsistent with its approach in comparable matters.

The titanic and unprecedented struggles going on between the civil rights community, as represented by the Leadership Conference, and the Administration have been obscured by the battles between the President and the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. This tiny agency with a budget of $13 million has done its duty and denounced the deviations from accepted and sound civil rights practice by the Reagan Administration. The White House was so incensed that for the first time in history a President has removed three of the commissioners and named their replacements. The legal and political impasse that has resulted has tended to take the focus off the central questions of policy differences between the Administration and the civil rights activists.

The damage being done to the enforcement of civil rights can be documented by ever more abundant evidence. Here are just a few instances:

1. In every year prior to the Reagan Administration between 20 and 32 actions were brought by the Justice Department to enforce the Federal Fair Housing laws. As of April 1983, only 5 cases had been filed under the Reagan Administration.

2. The White House has cut the staff at the Department of Labor's Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs by 50 percent.

3. According to the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, at the U.S. Department of Agriculture "civil rights enforcement has come to a virtual standstill."

4. The Justice Department has consistently refused to support the use of busing as a desegregation tool in any context. It has also advocated that Federal courts be deprived of their power to employ busing as a remedial device.

5. In fiscal year 1982 over $196 million went to programs for school desegregation efforts and for the Women's Educational Equity Act. The Administration desires to spend only $6.7 million on these programs in 1984.

The essential differences between the Administration's approach to civil rights and that of the Leadership Conference may become difficult to discern in the months prior to the 1984 election. The Administration continues to claim that it is enforcing civil rights vigorously. The Attorney General William French Smith recently blamed the constant criticism of the Administration's approach to civil rights as "irresponsible journalism." He asserted that "some of these critics desire to create hostility among minority Americans. The motivation can only be political."

The critics of the Administration will undoubtedly indulge in rhetoric of their own. They will tend to link charges of bias against blacks and women with criticism of the cutbacks in social programs for the poor and the handicapped. Careful and thoughtful evaluations of the legal and moral differences between the Administration and the advocates of civil rights are not likely to be numerous in the popular press.

What is clear, however, is that the Administration represents and may tend to exploit a deep feeling among many white Americans that they are in fact being denied opportunities in order that blacks can get ahead. This feeling may be largely unjustified. But it exists. It centers particularly on urban school systems, where the perception is often held that court-ordered integration has led to a decline in quality in the education offered.

The black community finds this feeling disappointing, even bewildering. They see it being used by the Administration as a justification for sharply curtailing programs that have brought significant advances to the 26 million black citizens of America. It is not surprising, therefore, that black leaders feel abandoned and deserted. They see the reverse in policy and practice of the Reagan Administration and they cry out for help. They have to recognize that the approach of the White House to civil rights will not change; the Administration will continue to be opposed to affirmative action, preferential hiring targets, school desegration by busing and expansive applications of Federal civil rights machinery.

So the black community reacts with anger and even rage. Some of those feelings account no doubt for the support which the Rev. Jesse Jackson is receiving in some quarters for his contemplated race for the presidency.

Longtime white civil rights activists are also experiencing a uniquely difficult time. The fear exists that attitudes toward integration may be permanently altered and that even the desire to bring about equality of opportunity by law may be sharply decreased in the minds of millions. But again there seems to be little hope of changing the minds of those in the Administration who are waging the counterrevolution against some of the fundamental policies of the civil rights revolution. But whites as well as blacks can be consoled that about $624 million will be spent next year in the major Federal programs established to enforce civil rights. This sum, however, (slightly less in actual dollars than in the year before) cannot achieve desirable results if much of it is being spent to finance changes and reversals rather than advances and improvements in the enforcement of civil rights.

Blacks, women and the advocates of civil rights are clearly planning to make the country's commitment to equality of opportunity a central issue in the 1984 campaign. The Administration will no doubt seek to make the changes it has brought about in civil rights policies and programs appear to be less radical than they are. The Administration may seek to make its policies appear to be less harsh by accepting the idea of a national holiday for Dr. Martin Luther King. But the record of the Administration has now been written. It is difficult if not impossible to undo the damage that has been done. Those who desire the "eradication" of prejudice, as called for by Vatican II, must seek to be well-informed so that in the forthcoming great national debate they can be calm and articulate defenders of the now challenged and threatened commitment that many years ago America made. That commitment pledged the United States Government to use in creative ways the full force of its civil and criminal law to make real equality available for all Americans.●

DUPLICITY: STANDARD SOVIET OPERATING TECHNIQUE

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, last October 22 I participated in a debate at Lake Zurich, Ill., High School with Valentin Berezhkov, whose son, Andrei, most recently attracted national attention by trying to defect to the United States.

At the time we shared the platform at Lake Zurich, Valentin Berezhkov was presented as a scholar, an academic who had written several books as a first-hand observer of such historic developments as the unholy partitioning of Poland consummated between Hitler and Stalin in Berlin in 1939.

Since those early days, Mr. Berezhkov has held numerous positions and had a diversified career, one which has spanned almost 50 years of intensely dedicated service to advancing the cause of world communism.

What Valentin Berezhkov did not say to the high school students at Lake Zurich, however, was that while holding the title of first secretary in the Soviet Embassy, he was in fact directing and managing the covert operations of the feared Soviet sector police apparatus in the Western hemisphere.

In the September 15, 1983, issue of the Washington Times, Peter Deriabin, a former KGB colleague of Valentin Berezhkov, reveals a side of Mr. Berezhkov not routinely advertised. Mr. Deriabin is most qualified to give a proper assessment of Berezhkov's role with the Soviet Government. Deriabin was in charge of Soviet counterintelligence in Vienna in 1954 when he appeared at the U.S. military headquarters in that city and asked for asylum. Prior to that assignment he was a Communist Party functionary inside the Kremlin's secret Bodyguard Directorate of the KGB, within the headquarters of the Foreign Intelligence Directorate in Moscow and Europe. He is familiar with Berezhkov's career.

The man that Deriabin exposes is not at all the distinguished journalist or diplomat that the Soviet Union would have us believe, but a crafty, professional spymaster who concentrated his efforts on undermining our way of life.

Mr. Deriabin's article is further confirmation of the extensive surveillance network the Soviets maintain here under the pretense of diplomatic missions and academic delegations. I commend it to my colleagues as an informative and interesting report.

[From the Washington Times, Wednesday, Sept. 14, 1983]

ALL ABOUT ANDREI'S FATHER, VALENTIN BEREZHKOV, THE 'DIPLOMAT'

(By Peter Deriabin)

As a consequence of the escapade of his teen-age son, the first secretary of the Soviet Embassy in Washington, Valentin Berezhkov, was precipitately recalled to the U.S.S.R. With his son, Andrei, and his wife, Valeria, he left by air on Aug. 18. His diplomatic career, it was said, was ruined.

I should like your indulgence to say a few words about Valentin Mikhaylovich Berezhkov, my former colleague.

The press described V.M. Berezhkov as a professional diplomat. He is a professional, all right. As I can testify from personal knowledge, Berezhkov is a veteran spymaster, one who has spent over 40 years in the ranks of the Soviet secret police, the KGB.

"Diplomat" is hardly the word for this 67-year-old tiger of the KGB, protege of Stalin, Molotov, Beria and Dekanozov. His tasks in Washington were sophisticated tasks for the KGB, not for the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which has plenty of young first secretaries available.

When Soviet Embassy strongmen paraded their captive 16-year-old Andrei in front of American television cameras, they offered a hint of the staged trials of past decades and a chilling reminder that fear and lies still govern the land the Soviets rule.

I never knew Berezhkov personally, although we met without being introduced, in the KGB in which we both served. (Its earlier designations, in our time, were NKVD, MGB and MVD). He worked mostly outside the precincts of the headquarters on Dzerzhinsky Square.

But while managing KGB secret work in Germany, I not only studied files on his activities—and worked under his old colleague there, KGB Gen. Aleksandr M. Korotkov—but I have also read Soviet books, never translated in the West, which describe highlights of Berezhkov's career. This old secret agent "wears a long tail," as they say.

For example, he helped Stalin help Hitler. As a "technical engineer" in the Soviet trade mission in Berlin, he helped negotiate the trade treaty signed on Feb. 11, 1940, which made it possible for Hitler to circumvent the British blockade.

Stalin thus assured Hitler the essential supplies for Nazi conquest of France, Belgium, Holland, Yugoslavia and Greece. He sent vast quantities of oil from Baku, iron and chrome ores, phosphate, grain from the Ukraine—and safe passage over the Trans-Siberian Railway of rubber from the Far East.

At the same time, Berezhkov was spying—using his good command of German in secret meetings with spies in Poland, Belgium and Holland during travels in 1940 "on trade matters" (as his autobiography puts it). And in Germany he was in contact with members of the network later to become famous as "The Red Orchestra."

In the fall of 1940, Berezhkov was called back from Berlin to change his cover from foreign trade to diplomacy and to join Foreign Minister Molotov and some of Stalin's top spies—Deputy State Security Chief Vsevolod Merkulov and former head of the foreign operations directorate, Vladimir Dekanozov—in a mission to Berlin to exploit Stalin's relations with Hitler and pave the way for bloody deportations from Poland, Bessarabia and the Baltic state.

Dekanozov stayed on in Berlin as Stalin's ambassador to Hitler, with Berezhkov as his "first secretary."

Berezhkov was still spying, of course. He claims in his memoirs that he even used his social contacts with Americans to meet useful German military men. When Hitler invaded the U.S.S.R. on June 22, 1941, the Soviet mission was interned.

But Berezhkov (using the alias "Kurt Huesker") bribed an SS oberleutnant to permit them a last excursion to town. There they eluded him, took a subway to meet and give final instructions and a radio set to an agent of the "Red Orchestra," Greta Kuckhoff.

After the interned Soviet and Nazi diplomatic missions were exchanged, Berezhkov worked in Moscow and accompanied the Soviet delegation to the 1943 Tehran Conference as an interpreter.

There he wrote in his memoirs, he incurred Stalin's displeasure when, caught with his mouth full of juicy steak, he couldn't translate a question Churchill asked Stalin. I sat there like a fool, my face red as a lobster. Everybody stared, then laughed. Stalin leaned over, his eyes gleaming and said through gritted teeth, '. . . this is disgraceful!' "

But his presence at Tehran permitted him, many years later, to perpetuate a famous Soviet lie: their alleged discovery of a German plot to assassinate Roosevelt at Tehran. Although by the time Berezhkov wrote his memoirs, this canard had long since been discredited, Berezhkov insisted that the NKVD had uncovered the plot. The fact is that Stalin and the NKVD invented it to induce Roosevelt to move over to the Soviet embassy—to Soviet microphones and away from Churchill.

Berezhkov came to the United States in 1944 as "interpreter" for the Dumbarton Oaks Conference drafting the United Nations Charter.

After the war Berezhkov again changed his cover—and entered a field which has probably been his specialty to this day. He became a "journalist" and used his "diplomatic" experience and contacts for KGB tasks of secret political influence.

He was assigned as special correspondent and deputy editor of New Times (Novoye Vremya), a magazine established by the KGB (the NKVD) in 1942 specifically to provide cover for Soviet intelligence officers abroad. One of its later correspondents, KGB Maj. Stanislav Levchenko, has recently testified that New Times reserves 12 of its 14 foreign bureaus for the KGB.

Berezhkov's moves back and forth between diplomacy and other work were not unlike those of his old boss in Berlin, Vladimir Dekanozov. Dekanozov had headed all the KGB's (then NKVD's) secret work abroad before he was sent to "sovietize" occupied Lithuania and then to be ambassador in Berlin. Later, Dekanozov was made KGB (then MVD) chief in the Georgian Republic. But his fate was to be less happy than Berezhkov's: When the notorious MVD chief Beria was arrested and shot, so was Dekanozov.

But this seems not to have hurt Berezhkov's career. He continued in his field of political influence, moving at the end of the 1960s, to a new institute which was to concentrate KGB and Central Committee work in this field—the U.S.-Canada Institute, now headed by Georgy Arbatov.

Berezhkov served 10 years there as editor-in-chief of its journal USA: Economics, Politics, Ideology. He cooperated with Arbatov in sophisticated efforts to mislead American scholars and policymakers. (The best account of "active measures"—the KGB's political influence operations—is to be found in the testimony before the U.S. Congress in 1982 by the former KGB major, Stanislav Levchenko.

And then Berezhkov came to the United States—as "first secretary of embassy." Now in his mid-60s, he clearly had other, special assignments of the sort he had had ever since earlier "first secretary" assignments 43 years ago.

He established social relations with American congressmen, government officials and scholars and kept in close touch with Arbatov and presumably with Gromyko and Andropov.

He was at least a very special adviser to Dobrynin and—who knows?—may have been foreseen as Dobrynin's successor.

Watching Berezhkov the father alongside his son, the American TV audience could hardly guess that of all the Soviet officials deciding young Andrei Berezhkov's fate, Valentin Berezhkov was the least likely ever to let his son stay in the land of "the main enemy."

He himself had helped build the prison that is called U.S.S.R. and which builds walls and lays mines on its borders to keep its people in, and shoots down airliners to keep curious eyes out.

But young Andrei had, unwittingly, thrown a stick into the spokes of Soviet secret work in Washington. He doubtless brought to an end the last mission abroad of his spy father.●

THE TIMING IS RIGHT FOR A TRILATERAL, NORTH AMERICAN SUMMIT

HON. NANCY L. JOHNSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, much debate centers around the pressing economic difficulties our Nation must face as we reevaluate our global relationships with our friends and trading partners. In this regard, it would seem appropriate at this time to actively pursue strengthened ties and closer cooperation on economic and trade matters with our neighbors, Canada and Mexico, who also continue to suffer from the worldwide economic recession. I am pleased to have this opportunity to share with my colleagues the thoughtful perspective of my constituent and good friend, Donald W. Davis, chairman and chief executive officer of the Stanley Works Corp. in New Britain, Conn., who calls for such a trilateral North American summit in the following editorial for the Hartford Courant:

[From the Hartford Courant, July 29, 1983]

THE TIMING IS RIGHT FOR A TRILATERAL, NORTH AMERICAN SUMMIT

(Donald W. Davis)

We must recognize that both Mexico and Canada have long established love/hate relationships with the United States. These relationships are certainly understandable in view of the disparity in culture and power between neighboring countries with common borders.

For various reasons, including the public's lack of interest, it is not well known how close Mexico came to repudiating its overseas loans last August. Had it repudiated the $82 billion indebtedness owed primarily to U.S. banks, the shock waves throughout the world financial community would have been colossal.

There is clearly much at stake in having sound, mutually beneficial economic and trade relations between the United States and Canada, between the United States and Mexico, and, to some lesser degree between Canada and Mexico.

To this end, it would seem most timely to have a three-nation North American summit with a focus on economic and trade matters.

Canada, the United States and Mexico are all blessed with great natural resources. We are dealing with three countries which (in spite of economic stresses and intermittent antagonisms) have special feelings of closeness. With 3,000 miles of common borders to the north and 2,000 to the south, logic tells us that for the sake of economic well-being and security, we must have friendly relationships.

All three have recently been through unusually difficult economic times caused by a world-wide recession; the dislocations caused by volatile oil prices; inflation, ranging from double digit in the United States and Canada to 100 percent in Mexico; historically high interest rates and dramatic devaluation of the peso from 25 to the U.S. dollar to 150.

The resulting unemployment and political and social stresses have swung from serious in the United States and Canada to nearly catastrophic in Mexico. The United States and Canada seem to be on the verge of economic recovery, whereas Mexico is in the early stages of massive austerity. It will take, at best, two to three years to produce positive results in terms of increased employment or improved living conditions.

One symptom of Mexico's crisis is the illegal immigration of millions of Mexicans into the United States over the past few years. The political and emotional overtones for a neighbor with major unemployment problems of its own are obvious.

Over the past few years, these three North American neighbors have had a litany of economic confrontations. We all remember the headlines of tariff disputes with Canada on automobile parts; objections to U.S. investment in key Canadian industries—particularly of national resources, such as oil and mining.

We can recall our problems with Mexico over the price of its oil, when the U.S. government was sufficiently insensitive to offer less favorable prices for Mexican oil than for Canadian oil.

It is clearly in the best interests of all three countries to move away from this kind of myopic scrapping toward a new level of discussions based on mutually advantageous economic objectives.

The timing appears right to make such an effort through a trilateral summit. One agenda item could have as its focus something as primitive as barter.

Mexico clearly needs our agricultural products, products for which our supply greatly exceeds present market demand.

And, in spite of a seemingly adequate supply of oil and gas in the United States at the moment, greater use of Mexican oil vs. Mideast oil, and of Mexican gas—some of which is still being flared off at no benefit to anyone—would make sense for both the United States and Mexico.

How agricultural products could be exchanged for gas and oil—and how similarly advantageous trading arrangements between the United States and Canada and Canada and Mexico could be facilitated—could make up an important part of such a North American summit agenda.

It would be very important that a call for such a summit not be dominated or even initiated by the United States, but rather some means be found for a joint initiative.

Among the three countries, every effort should be made to keep and summit at a level of equality and respect.

While bilateral discussions between the United States and Canada or between the United States and Mexico generally are interpreted as having patronizing overtones, tri-partite discussions between the three North American countries could avoid such negative connotations.

Getting Mexico to recognize that it is part of North America would be the first hurdle. With the present disarray in Central America and Mexico's obvious need for more support and trade with the United States, this would seem to be surmountable.

We do not want Mexico to be drawn into the Central American malaise. It is important for all three North American countries to meet soon, on equal terms to ensure our friendship and to establish sound and equitable economic ties.●

LET US TALK ABOUT THE MONROE DOCTRINE

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to strongly recommend to my friends here in the Congress an interesting and timely editorial from the Washington Post. The article presents some cogent arguments as to why the United States should resurrect the Monroe Doctrine and again use this pronouncement as a guide for America's foreign policy efforts in this hemisphere. I agree with the writer and want to share my personal thoughts on this issue with all of you.

Whether we realize it or not, this is an age of doctrines and our country will be naked and defenseless without a viable one which is supported by Congress and the American people. Let us take a look at Soviet doctrines. Initially, there is a Soviet doctrine which has been used to guide and justify Soviet territorial expansionism for years. The captive republics in the Soviet Union are mute testimony to the existence of that basic guiding principle.

This doctrine of expansionism also includes a justification for creation of buffer states to protect the inner areas of "Mother Russia." Afghanistan is the most recent victim of this doctrine. How many of us have read the Kremlin's incredulous explanation for why the Soviets invaded and dominated that lovely land. The Soviets claimed that they had been invited in to protect the Afghan people. I also believe that the Soviets made it quite clear that the United States should not interfere. They considered Afghanistan to be in their sphere of influence and vital to their national interests. I think that it is obvious that the Soviets and our other adversaries in the world have doctrines which give focus and direction to their foreign policy efforts. The record shows that in the last 65 years, the Communists have conquered 43 sovereign nations that now have a current combined population of 1.6 billion. The Communists have in the past and will in the future continue to expand their influence.

There is also a new doctrine called the Andropov Doctrine. Not unlike the Brezhnev Doctrine, it is a program designed to continue spreading revolution, terrorism and violence to the nations in the Caribbean, Central America, and all of South America. Already, they are fomenting revolutionary wars in our own backyard and are using their Cuban and Nicaraguan surrogates to further their goals. At this very moment, leftist terrorist forces are attacking governments committed to democracy for the entire region. If most Americans knew the actual dimensions of the Soviet threat to our hemisphere, all of them would unequivocally support what our country is doing in that area. We are working to establish peace and freedom and want to eliminate terrorism, lawlessness, and intimidation. We are trying to establish a peaceful and stable environment in Central America which will foster the growth of democratic institutions in that region.

Few Americans realize, for example, that since 1962 the Soviet Union has shipped nearly 700,000 tons of arms to Cuba. Over 130,000 tons were shipped during the past 2 years. Every day, the Soviets provide Cuba with over $10 million in economic assistance. In addition, there are over 2,500 Soviet soldiers stationed in Cuba and over 9,000 Soviet military and civilian advisers and technicians. The array of sophisticated Soviet military equipment on that island is astounding. They have undertaken this massive military buildup in spite of the fact that President Kennedy promised that the United States would not invade Cuba.

With all of this in mind, I suggest that the administration bring back the Monroe Doctrine. It is time to again make clear to all parties that intrusion by totalitarian powers in our hemisphere will not be tolerated. As President Monroe did over 150 years ago, our President should announce to the world that keeping this hemisphere free of our enemies is vital to our national security. We must tell the world that we intend to defend the freedom, peace, and stability in this hemisphere with whatever means necessary against threats from totalitarian powers delivered from abroad.

EXHUME THE MONROE DOCTRINE

(By William F. Buckley, Jr.)

Ten days after the missile crisis was resolved in October 1962, a half-dozen New Yorkers met (at my initiative) with Marvin Liebman, the principal anti-communist organizational entrepreneur of those days. The proposal was to found a Committee for the Monroe Doctrine. Our thesis was that the terms of the Kennedy-Khrushchev démarche had the effect of repealing the traditional American guarantee against colonization, a doctrine promulgated in 1823 and gradually modified during the 19th century.

You will recall that Khrushchev promised to take his missiles out of Cuba, restoring the status quo ante, in return for which Kennedy promised not to invade Cuba, thereby confirming the status of Cuba as a Soviet satellite, in defiance of the Monroe Doctrine. That was quite a diplomatic victory. Another one like that, and the Soviets will have an aircraft carrier on Lake Huron.

That was the point the committee wished to make. Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker accepted the chairmanship, and the committee worked for a year or so, attempting to get Congress to exhume the Monroe Doctrine for the purpose of declaring Soviet control of Cuba as—to use the pastoral diction of yesteryear—"the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."

What happened was not much. The country was too far gone in hagiolatry. JFK was the hero of the missile encounter, and that was that. The problem being, of course, that we are face to face with the Son of the Missile Crisis in El Salvador and Nicaragua right now, and having lost the Monroe Doctrine, we have lost our diplomatic gyroscope.

Here are facts no one this side of the Institute for Policy Studies would contradict, i.e., on one unpossessed by ideology. They are: 1) Cuba is receiving over $10 million of military and economic material from the Soviet Union every day. 2) A substantial part of that equipment Cuba is sending on to Nicaragua, which now has on tap about 100,000 soldiers, plus modern weaponry including 50 tanks. 3) Nicaragua has declared that it is engaged in a "revolution without frontiers." To dramatize its, point, every day Nicaragua is introducing weapons through Honduras overland, and by air drop across Honduras, into El Salvador. The material thus provided has sustained a protracted civil war in El Salvador. If it were not for Nicaragua, the civil war in El Salvador would be as threatening as the recent post-concert rampage in Cental Park. And if it were not for Cuba, Nicaragua would not be mounting a holy war in the name of Karl Marx against her neighbors. And if it were not for the Soviet Union, Castro would have to finance his own armies, only he'd be broke, like Pinochet.

Along comes Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan to tell the United States that we should face the problem at its source, namely the Soviet Union. That is a very good idea, because there is no question that the Soviet Union is behind it all. President Reagan reminded us of this in a recent speech in Orlando, Fla. But the trouble with protesting to Andropov is that such protests have a way of amusing him.

We don't have what it takes to challenge the Soviet Union, and it was an intuition of this order that led Presidents Monroe, and Polk, and Cleveland, to keep their sights down to countries in this hemisphere. It is Cuba we need to come to terms with. Our terms. The only other terms are theirs: continuing bloody revolution up and down the hemisphere.

We should obviously seek peaceful solutions to our problems. But this does not entitle us to say that these are not "our" problems. If Monroe considered it our problem back in 1823, when in order to reach Nicaragua you needed to sail across the ocean for 10 days or more, it is certainly our problem 160 years later, when missiles cover the distance between Managua and Washington in eight minutes.

But what is it we are supposed to use our Army and Navy and Air Force for, if not to keep the peace? One joins with those who express impatience at the disingenuous official explanation of what our fleet is up to on Nicaraguan waters. What it ought to be up to ought to be plain: cut out your war against the government of El Salvador, or we'll make war on you and your supplier.●

THE GROWING LIST OF CITIZEN SUPPORT FOR THE CLINCH RIVER BREEDER REACTOR

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on September 15, 1983, the Science and Technology Subcommittee on Energy Research and Production heard testimony from more than a dozen witnesses on the Clinch River alternative financing plan now before the Congress. This plan would supplement Government funding arrangements over the next 7 years with $1 billion of private contributors', investors', and lenders' funds. This amounts to about 40 percent of the total funds required to complete the project.

I have been an ardent advocate of this invaluable technology development project throughout its controversial political history. I have maintained my support in spite of the project's rising costs—most of these cost increases, according to the Inspector General's Office, have been the result of politically induced delays. It has been my considered judgment that these costs are insignificant when measured in terms of the energy independence the breeder reactor will provide future generations of Americans. Lest any of my colleagues become complacent about this fact, please note the recent media reports on the Middle East situation. Iran is threatening to shut off the Persian Gulf to shipping. This could impact one-sixth of the free world's oil exports. The cost to complete Clinch River represents less than 2 weeks' worth of imported oil to the United States. Opponents of CRBR who testified at the hearing attempted to ignore this fact. They also gave the impression that the vast majority of Americans oppose the project. I wish to submit for the RECORD a recent compilation of organizational support—quite strong support I might add—for the Clinch River breeder reactor. Clearly a broad spectrum of our citizens perceive the inestimable value of the project to our Nation's energy future. They recognize the near term fiscal relief that the proposed private sector financing plan will afford the Government. I applaud their vision and their astuteness, and urge my colleagues to follow their lead.

ALTERGATE—ANOTHER VIEW

HON. JOHN HILER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. HILER. Mr. Speaker, while I realize several of my colleagues would like the "Altergate" issue to go away, it is becoming increasingly clear that the American people do not tolerate and will not tolerate the Orwellian tampering of official documents.

The Elkhart Truth, a leading daily newspaper in the Third Congressional District of Indiana, which I represent, recently let its views be known on the Justice Department's decision to pursue its own investigation into this serious matter.

It is a well-written editorial, and one that I think accurately characterizes just what is at stake here. I submit the editorial to be published in the RECORD, and commend it to my colleagues.

The article follows:

[From the Elkhart Truth, Sept. 23, 1983]

RECORD ALTERED

The Justice Department has taken its time getting around to investigating the alteration of records of House committee hearings held back in July 1982.

There appears to be no question that the transcript of two days of hearings on the Environmental Protection Agency was changed, to make Republican speakers look silly and make Democrats look good. A committee staff member admitted making "unauthorized changes" and quietly resigned over the Labor Day weekend.

Rep. John Hiler and other congressmen whose words were changed can't be blamed for wanting an investigation to get to the bottom of it. For one thing, apparently a felony has been committed. And there is the arrogance of staff, hired by the majority party, taking liberties with the record at the expense of the other party.

Besides the possibility of criminal prosecution, among the questions still needing answers are what were the motives? how many people were involved? and have other committee transcripts also been tampered with?

There is politics here, to be sure. Some see it as getting back at Democrats for making an issue of the campaign briefing book. But something else sets this apart: Members of both parties have an equal interest in making sure that the record of what they say is dependable. The public also has an interest in that. Without a reliable record, we have no way to check up on our lawmakers. Whatever cause the zealous persons responsible for this thought they were serving, keeping the record straight is one of the essentials for running a democracy.●

OCCUPATIONAL CENTER'S 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, our Nation has at long last recognized its commitment to provide millions of handicapped Americans the opportunity to lead productive, working lives. Being handicapped no longer means that people are resigned to a life of total dependency. As proof of this, the Occupational Center of Roselle, N.J., is embarked on its 25th year of training the handicapped to make their own living in useful occupations.

This private, nonprofit rehabilitation training agency and sheltered workshop for the handicapped has breathed new hope into the lives of handicapped workers and their families. They have a place to learn to work, to earn, and be respected as useful citizens working within the confines of their handicaps.

Founded in 1958 by a group of volunteer social service charitable organizations, the Occupational Center operates on the premise that disabled people could, in the proper setting, be employed to do productive work. Starting with four individuals in a storefront in Elizabeth, N.J., the Occupational Center has grown in 25 years to provide job training, mental health services, and employment to 300 handicapped people on a daily basis. In addition, over 600 others have been placed in jobs in the private sector since the center began operating.

Through its success in meeting the needs of the handicapped, the Occupational Center has expanded its program. Two workshops and training centers in Roselle and Berkeley Heights, N.J., serve residents of four counties in northern New Jersey. The Occupational Center recently began participating in the State's deinstitutionalism program by accepting for rehabilitation and employment those people who have spent most of their lives in confinement and are now living in the community. I have visited these residents and the Occupational Center on several occasions, and found it to be an experience in human dignity and human rights that makes me proud to be associated with the many fine people who have pioneered and supported this program.

The Occupational Center is not a charity. It is good business. After a handicapped individual is trained for employment, the center attempts to place the client in a private sector job. However, some of these people simply cannot make it in the outside world, but they can be productive workers in the sheltered setting the Occupational Center provides. For them, it may be their lifetime employment.

As the director of the Occupational Center, Mel Cook, points out,

> The workshops are a good value to the community. Institutional costs are 5 to 10 times the workshop costs, and an adult living at home in idleness requires more support and is a drain on our national economic life. The working handicapped are wage earners and taxpayers. It is simply good business to support handicapped workshops.

I wish to congratulate Warren Roche, president of the board of diretors, and the other board members, Nida E. Thomas, Ronald Goodrich, James S. Bell. John Kovalcik, Gerald DeBenedette, and Augustin Venero, for their commitment to the continued success of the Occupational Center and their compassionate understanding of the desire of the handicapped to be useful and respected members of society.●

RECIPIENTS OF THE PRESIDENTIAL AWARDS FOR EXCELLENCE

HON. NORMAN SISISKY

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. SISISKY. Mr. Speaker, on September 13, the President of the United States announced the names of 104 teachers who are the 1983 recipients of the Presidential Awards for Excellence in Science and Mathematics Teaching.

Of the two awards bestowed upon the State of Virginia, I am proud to announce the name of an awardee from the Fourth Congressional District: Edna Hyke Corbett.

Ms. Corbett, who teaches at the I. C. Norcom High School in Portsmouth, Va., serves as an example of the outstanding contribution teachers have made and are still making to our country.

The future of our country is in the hands of today's youth. How lucky we are to have such a dedicated educator guiding them in the Portsmouth School District.

Ms. Corbett is an inspiration to other teachers who will follow her lead and renew our Nation's determination to improve the educational opportunities for all students.●

DRAFT HOSPICE REGULATIONS STILL UNACCEPTABLE

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, the ongoing battle to provide hospice care to the terminally ill remains a direct source of concern to those of us who are committed to assuring that this service remains available to all of those who need it.

Draft regulations now being circulated by the Department of Health and Human Services are still unacceptable for they seek to delete the very essence of the same program we are trying to create.

The concerns with the draft rules are very succinctly articulated in the following letter sent to me by the New York State Hospice Association. I believe that this letter outlines the very special reasons why these draft regulations should be sent back to the drawing table. Clearly, closer consultation with Congress is essential if we are to provide hospice care in an appropriate fashion. I commend the New York State Association's letter to my colleagues for their attention.

In my capacity as an original member of the House Select Committee on Aging, I pledge to do all that I can to assure that hospice care becomes a right for all and not just a privilege for a few.

The letter follows:

NEW YORK STATE
HOSPICE ASSOCIATION,
White Plains, N.Y., September 21, 1983.

Hon. MARIO BIAGGI,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Human Services, House Select Committee on Aging, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BIAGGI: Because I know that you have a continuing interest in the development of hospice care, I am writing to share our concern over the proposed hospice regulations with you.

This draft of the regulations is an improvement over earlier versions and we are appreciative of the effort that has gone into making those improvements. However, the proposed regulations still contain a number of elements that may either exclude large numbers of patients who need care or make it financially impossible for hospices to operate. The following comments do not touch on all of the regulations' deficiencies or problems, simply those we have identified as the most serious.

1. The regulations state that only the patient may sign the election form. Such a requirement will bar many patients who are in need of care from participating, since, either as a result of the disease process or medication, many patients are not able to make an informed decision. Further, it leaves unanswered the question who may revoke the election if the previously competent patient is now not competent and the physician or family feel that some other form care has become appropriate. Clearly, a guardian or family member must be able to act for an incompetent patient.

2. Further, the regulations state that the patient must sign an election statement that indicates an "awareness that he or she is terminally ill." As hospice workers know, "awareness" comes and goes and often exists simultaneously with hope of getting well. Many, many patients who know they are dying and want hospice care, would not or could not sign a direct statement.

This "awareness" can be indicated by an election statement that simply states what the hospice does and does not do such as "since active curative treatment is no longer appropriate, hospice will provide only care aimed at comfort, not care aimed at cure or remission of the disease."

3. Reimbursement is to be calculated on 1981 figures with no adjustment for inflation. HCFA justified this on the grounds that the demonstration programs that generated these figures were not motivated to be cost effective. All of the motivation in the world will not allow hospices to hire staff or buy supplies or pay rent at 1981 figures. The caps on both the reimbursement and inpatient care are burden enough for programs to bear and are a sufficient guarantee of savings to the system.

4. The 80/20 ration of home to inpatient care that the hospice law established was meant as a basis for reimbursement, not as a condition of participation. Using this ration as a condition of participation will simply discriminate against patients who need care the most, those who live alone or with partners who are too old or ill to care for them.

5. The regulations would require that the bulk of the care rendered during continuous care periods be given by a Registered Nurse. It is often the case that the care needed can be rendered by a home health aide or practical nurse under the supervision of an RN. Mandating a more expensive level of care when it is not needed does not serve the best interests of the hospice or the patient.

6. A Masters degree in Social Work should be the minimum requirement, not a Bachelors. Working with multi-problem families under the stress of terminal illness requires higher levels of skill and experience.

7. The definition of the volunteers' role and training requirements are reasonable, straight forward, and HCFA is to be commended on them. However, the suggested methods of guaranteeing volunteer use are completely unworkable. Regional numerical standards, ratios of volunteers to paid staff or volunteers to patients are all extremely bad ideas. Clearly, levels of affluence, employment, education, age variations and many other factors enter into how many volunteers can be recruited and how many patient/families will want volunteer involvement.

Hospice programs rely on the quality of their volunteers, not the quantity. I suggest that the financial pressure that hospices operate under will be a sufficient incentive for volunteer use.

418.70(c) states "The hospices must document active and ongoing effort to recruit and retain volunteers." That standard is an adequate safeguard.

HCFA states that "The costs associated with implementation of volunteer services should be negligible." And hence declines to include the volunteer program as a part of the operating cost. The staff time involved in recruiting, screening, training and supervising volunteers is not negligible. It is at least a full time position for one person or a part time job for many staff members. Hence the cost is not negligible.

In summary, many aspects of the regulations seem aimed at limiting the number of patient families who will be able to participate or limiting reimbursement for hospices, rather than at assuring quality care for those who are dying.

Allowing hospices insufficient reimbursement to survive and limiting access to the program does not serve the best interest of patients or the health care system since patients will simply stay in the present acute care system and receive less appropriate care at greater cost.

I would welcome an opportunity to discuss these issues with you or a member of your staff.

Sincerely,

CAROL SELINSKE,
Chair, Legislative Committee.●

THE PRESIDENT SEES THE LIGHT ON THE UNITARY TAX SYSTEM

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, two cheers for the President for supporting the Supreme Court decision to uphold the right of States to use the unitary method of taxation. Unitary taxation reduces State budget deficits, impedes corporate tax evasion and shifts the tax burden off of struggling small businesses onto huge, wealthy multinationals.

I say two cheers because the issue has not been resolved yet and I want to reserve final approval until it is settled favorably. The administration is establishing a Commission to study unitary taxation which I hope will bury the issue as deep as possible, and once and for all.

Nevertheless, let me give the President one cheer for agreeing with the unitary tax in principle and a second cheer for standing up to his misguided Council of Economic Advisers who seem interested in protecting the few at the expense of the weak. Mr. Reagan will earn a third cheer and my firm approval if he stands firm in the face of the inevitable lobbying blitz that will come from the multinationals and our trading partners—a blitz that will include declarations of impending bankruptcy, threats of trade retaliation, and shrill predictions of the imminent downfall of the world economy.

The President should stand firm to help the States be fiscally independent, and to protect small businesses and consumers from the tax burden caused but not funded by these corporate monoliths who play financial hide and seek with the tax collectors and then spirit their profits out of the country.

The President and I have not agreed often in the past but I am glad he has seen the light of fairness on this issue. I fervently hope he will demonstrate his strength and stand by his convictions.●

LEARN LATIN AMERICA'S CULTURE

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, our former colleague, Jim Symington, recently published an article in the New York Times that was of particular interest to me as a senior counselor to the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America (Kissinger Commission).

Jim's article speaks to what he calls "the one consideration that has frustrated earlier efforts in dealing with Latin America—our fundamental, dogged, appalling ignorance of the Latin mind and culture." His conclusion is that the Kissinger Commission should recommend "both an early exposure to Latin American language and literature in our schools and a vastly expanded student and teacher exchange program with our sister republics so that commissions of the future, diplomats—possibly even Presidents—might know something of the cultural lessons that stir our neighbors' hearts."

This is a sensible and important idea. I hope the Commission makes such a recommendation, and I hope Congress adopts it. And I hope my colleagues will read the article, which follows:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 23, 1983]

(By James W. Symington)

WASHINGTON.—The Kissinger panel on Central America doubts that its long-term recommendations can be ready before 1984. It might be excused for taking a bit longer if it addressed the one consideration that has frustrated earlier efforts in dealing with Latin America—our fundamental, dogged, appalling ignorance of the Latin mind and culture.

Foreign students and statement refresh their perceptions of the United States by reading our poets, essayists, novelists and humorists. But our approach is like that of the man who, when asked which hurt most, ignorance or apathy, replied, "I don't know and I don't care." Such indifference cannot be justified by our otherwise commendable concern for what people do rather than what they think.

Preoccupied with action, we seldom miss opportunities to ignore thought. I recall a vivid illustration of this at the 1967 Conference of American Presidents in Punta del Este, Uruguay. The conference was scheduled, as usual, to consider, yet again, mutual measures to enhance security, peace and economic progress throughout the hemisphere. President Otto Arosemena Gómez of Ecuador, who delivered the keynote address, said, in an introductory sentence: "May the genius of Uruguay which produced 'Ariel' guide our thoughts." I looked around. The reference produced no visible reaction among our diplomats, nor among our Latin-American counterparts. We, I surmised, did not understand it, and they did. What was "Ariel"?

Such curiosity apparently afflicted neither our officials who were sipping water and fingering their prepared responses, nor our press, which was exchanging banter and waiting for the "bottom line" (aid and trade figures). American society has become so dependent on bottom lines that it doesn't trouble to read the preceding ones.

During lunch, I caught a bus into town, found a bookstore and bought a paperback "Ariel," a touching and brilliant essay written in 1900 and addressed to Uruguayan youth. It urges them to revere the respect for truth in pagan Athens that early Christians refined with love and humanity but which modern "democratic puritanism" was burying under layers of stifling conformity.

The author of "Ariel" José Enrique Rodó (1872-1917), saw the United States as "Caliban." He wrote of "a mighty confederation realizing over us a sort of moral conquest." He cautioned young Uruguayans not to let admiration of North American material progress serve to "de-Latinize" them but rather urged them to preserve the integrity of their identity. Rodó was a visionary, a romatic. Whether his critique of the United States was accurate or fair, it certainly had been read and admired by many if not most of President Lyndon B. Johnson's fellow conferees.

That it drew upon the inspiration of Shakespeare, the most revered author in the English-speaking world, conferred upon its usage on this occasion a special irony.

Rodó was optimistic. Having acknowledged the United States as "the first to evoke our modern idea of liberty, and to convert it . . . into imperishable bronze and living reality," he dimly foresaw: "even a higher concord in the future, that will be due not to a one-sided imitation of one race by another, but to a reciprocity of influences and a skillful harmonizing of those attributes which make the peculiarities of either race."

Some recognition by the United States of this "genius of Uruguay" might have been useful—as well as astounding. But it is easier to pass a camel through the eye of a needle than alter a position paper. Moreover, we were interested in "substance."

It is not really the business of commissions to study cultures. Nonetheless, what the Kissinger panel could suggest to great advantage is both an early exposure to Latin-American language and literature in our schools and a vastly expanded student and teacher exchange program with our sister republics so that commissions of the future, diplomats—possibly even Presidents—might know something of the cultural lessons that stir our neighbors' hearts.

(James W. Symington, a lawyer, and a Democrat, represented the Second District of Missouri in the House from 1969 to 1977.)●

TRIBUTE TO JOHN F. HENNING

HON. SALA BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, one of the leaders of the California labor movement, Jack Henning, is being honored at a dinner in San Francisco on October 14. I would like to take this opportunity to bring to my colleagues' attention the career of this good friend and outstanding labor leader.

John F. Henning was elected in 1970 to the position of executive secretary-treasurer, the top elected post in the California Labor Federation. He has been unanimously reelected since then. The federation is the official State AFL-CIO organization and embraces approximately 1,700,000 union members.

Jack served as U.S. Ambassador to New Zealand from 1967 to 1969 and as U.S. Under Secretary of Labor from 1962 to 1967. He has been a member of the board of regents of the University of California since 1977.

Jack Henning's dedication to the labor movement and to progressive politics is matched only by his love of his Irish heritage. The dinner honoring him is being held at the United Irish Cultural Center in San Francisco and sponsored by the San Francisco-based American Irish Alliance. He is a cofounder and past president of the Irish Literary and Historical Society, cochairman of the American Labor Committee for Human Rights in Northern Ireland, and executive committee member of the Irish American Coalition.

Jack was a friend and close political ally of my husband for many, many years. A native San Franciscan, he was immensely helpful in my recent election campaign and in Phillip's election last year. He understands the need for working people to be active in politics and has worked hard to build the California Labor Federation into a strong political force.●

PHYLLIS TROY FROM RICHMOND WITH LOVE

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, October 15, 1983, marks a significant event for the people of Richmond and for the U.S. House of Representatives. On that day 30 years ago, Mrs. Phyllis Troy began a notable and significant career of service to the people of the Third Congressional District of Virginia and to the people of the United States.

During seven Presidential administrations from Eisenhower to Reagan, Mrs. Troy has served continuously the various Representatives from the Third District of Virginia. From 1953 until 1965 she was a member of the committee staff and the personal staff of Congressman J. Vaughan Gary. His successor, Congressman David E. Satterfield, had both the good sense and the good fortune to retain Mrs. Troy as his personal secretary for his entire tenure until 1980.

I consider myself and the people of the Richmond area to be most blessed that Mrs. Troy agreed to continue her service to the Commonwealth of Virginia by becoming a member of my personal staff upon my election to the Congress. Her skill, knowledge, and loyalty have been invaluable assets to my entire staff and most especially to me. After 30 years, Mrs. Troy continues to perform a multitude of duties with enthusiasm, energy, hard-nosed ability, and a keen sense of humor. She cracks the whip with a gentle hand.

But most important, Mr. Speaker, I consider Mrs. Troy to be a faithful and devoted friend. Her strong support and unswerving commitment have been a source of personal encouragement and gratification. It is, therefore, an honor and privilege for me on behalf of the people of the Third Congressional District of Virginia and her colleagues here on Capitol Hill to wish Phyllis Troy the heartiest congratulations on this her 30th anniversary. May her life continue to overflow with all the good things of this world, and may those around her continue to benefit for many more years from the abundant charm and beauty of such a marvelous lady.●

SENATE—Thursday, September 29, 1983

(Legislative day of Monday, September 26, 1983)

The Senate met at 8:45 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

"Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven."

Gracious Father God, we thank Thee for struggle, out of which comes strength and truth. We thank Thee when good, strong, wise women and men struggle for the right way. We thank Thee for the sacrificial struggle of our Founding Fathers who gave us a document so fundamental and timeless that it continues to be the central issue in the contemporary struggle in Congress.

At this critical, historic moment in our national life, dear God, grant that this struggle will issue in truth, righteousness, justice, and peace. Whatever the Senators will wish they had done when it is too late to do it, help them to do it today. In the name of Him who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the preliminaries this morning will be very brief, not only because we have reduced the time for the standing orders but, as far as I can tell, I am the only person here.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield just a moment for that——

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is an omission that I will regret until my dying political day. I will never hear the end of that, Mr. President, and I apologize to the Senator from Vermont because he was behind me and I was looking forward. But I can think of no one I would rather have behind me than the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I would say standing respectfully behind the leader.

Mr. BAKER. To continue, Mr. President, I have no need for my remaining time under the abbreviated standing order except to say that at 9 a.m. we will be back on the resolution.

I ask unanimous consent that the time for the minority leader may be reserved for his use during the course of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JEPSEN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. And I yield the remainder of my time and ask that the Chair place us in a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 9 a.m. with statements therein limited to 1 minute each.

THE BIGGEST, FATTEST WASTE IN THE FEDERAL BUDGET

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Center for Defense Information has estimated that this country will spend $65 billion in the coming year in preparing for nuclear war. In the 6 years, 1983 through 1988 inclusive, we will spend a total of $457 billion for nuclear forces. This will constitute more than 22 percent of our military budget. Does this colossal investment increase the military security of this country or does it actually make us less secure? Do we need to spend this much or nearly this much to deter the Soviets from initiating a nuclear first strike against us? Listen to a military expert. Former Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara a few weeks ago said:

> I do not believe we can avoid a serious and unacceptable risk of nuclear war until we recognize—and until we base all our military plans, defense budgets, weapon deployments, and arms negotiations on the recognition—that nuclear weapons serve no military purpose whatsoever. They are totally useless—except only to deter one's opponents from using them.

Is McNamara right? Of course, he is right. Once a nuclear war starts, both the Soviet Union and this country are dead. Civilization is destroyed. The human species may or may not perish entirely. But at best life would revert to that human condition Hobbes described centuries ago as nasty, brutish, and short. This would be the case if nuclear war should break out today. As time goes by this hideous situation gets worse. Spending on nuclear weapons has more than doubled in the past 3 years. In the next decade the United States will build about 17,000 new nuclear weapons. And the Soviets will match our buildup. What an utterly incredible waste of resources by both super powers! On Monday, September 26, President Reagan spoke at the United Nations. He made three main points: First, the United States is willing to deploy some medium range nuclear warheads outside Western Europe if Moscow agrees to a global limit. Second, the United States would negotiate limits on aircraft that can carry nuclear arms in Europe. Third, this country would consider reducing its planned deployment of cruise and Pershing II missiles.

These three proposals may succeed in winning the support of NATO countries for our negotiating posture. The Soviets, however, have at this point reacted negatively. And at least temporarily they have offered no counter offers. But even if somehow we reach an agreement with the Soviet Union on the deployment of additional intermediate range nuclear weapons in Europe, and even if the Soviet Union also concurs in President Reagan's offer to limit the number of warheads deployed throughout the world by both sides, the effect on our nuclear buildup would be negligible. We would still even if the full Reagan arms control agenda goes into effect be spending $450 billion for nuclear weapons over the next 6 years. We would still immensely accelerate the nuclear arms race.

Mr. President, I believe that the overwhelming majority of Americans fully recognize this. The people who live in my State of Wisconsin cannot be very different from the American citizens who live in the other 49 States. We have a strong military tradition in Wisconsin. Our National Guard distinguished themselves in the Civil War, and again in World War I, and World War II. Our citizens are very proud of that record. The Wisconsin National Guard air arm has won competitions as the best Air National Guard in the country. Now in the judgment of many experts the U.S. National Guard Air Force is the best in the world. We also have an enthusiastic and highly successful Naval, Air Force, and Army Reserve in Wisconsin. So we in Wisconsin have a solid military tradition. And yet when

I go back to my State and talk to literally thousands of people on main streets, in supermarkets, at football and baseball and basketball games, in town squares in taverns and wherever our people congregate, I hear a single theme over and over again. It is a very logical question. It goes like this: "Proxmire, why are we spending tens of billions of dollars for more and more nuclear weapons when we already have enough to blow the Russians and everyone else off the face of the Earth?" Wisconsin people are hard working, thrifty people. They resent seeing their hard earned tax money wasted by being flushed down the rathole by a Federal Government that spent hundreds of billions of dollars buying nuclear weapons that—as Secretary McNamara has rightly said, "serve no military purpose whatsoever."

And, Mr. President, many thoughtful citizens in my State go considerably farther than this. They see the continued nuclear arms build-up, not as making them more secure, but actually making them less secure. They wisely recognize that as both the United States, and the Soviet Union, build up their nuclear arsenals, some human or computer error a misinterpretation of signals from our warning mechanisms could set off a nuclear catastrophe that becomes potentially more devastating with each passing year as we and the Soviets amass more and more lethal weapons. They also increasingly recognize that the arms race between the superpowers pushes the technology of nuclear war farther and farther ahead and makes it increasingly more practical for additional countries to build their own nuclear arsenal.

GENOCIDE BY FAMINE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this year marks the 50th anniversary of one of the most brutal and extensive acts of genocide the world has ever seen. I am referring to the conscious effort by the Soviet Government to systematically eliminate the independent Ukrainian peasants by deliberately starving millions of people. This week, several activities have been organized to commemorate this horrible, yet little known, example of genocide.

Displays have been set up in both the Russell Senate Office Building and the Cannon House Office Building to help the general public understand the magnitude of this atrocity. Our colleagues in the House this week scheduled a special order to provide Members with an opportunity to recognize this tragedy. The week's events will culminate in a mass rally at the Washington Monument.

Mr. President, it is truly fitting that we call attention to this unspeakable action. At the height of the famine, in 1932 and 1933, an average of 10,000 men, women, and children died of hunger each day. While this was occurring, Soviet officials denied that a famine existed, refused international aid, and increased grain exports from the region. Perhaps as many as 7 million Ukrainians lost their lives as a result of this premeditated policy to force collectivism and break the will of the Ukrainian peasantry. By forcing the peasants to turn all their grain over to the state, by confining the Ukrainians to their homeland, and by preventing any food from entering the Ukraine from Russia, the Soviet Government sought to remove a major impediment to Moscow's plans to create a centralized, totalitarian state.

We find it difficult to believe that the elimination of an entire segment of the population can be part of a conscious plan. And yet, such has been the case in the past, and such could be the case in the future. Stephan Procyk, the executive director of the Ukrainian National Committee on Genocide, defined the purpose of the 50th anniversary commemoration: We focus attention on the famine in the hopes that a holocaust of this nature will never happen again. But remembering is not enough. We must do all that we can to insure that genocide will never again be condoned. Ratification of the Genocide Convention would be a major step in this direction.

Mr. President, the repercussions of the Ukrainian famine are still being felt in the Soviet Union. An article in the July 7 Wall Street Journal by Adrian Karatnycky, entitled "Forced Famine in the Ukraine: A Holocaust the West Forgot" sums up the horror of this brutal action.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORCED FAMINE IN THE UKRAINE: A HOLOCAUST THE WEST FORGOT

(By Adrian Karatnycky)

Fifty years ago this past spring, the normally bountiful fields of the Ukraine were filled with the odor of death. Crows flew over the steppe, awaiting their feast of human carrion. Corpses littered the streets and roadways. In the June 6, 1933, issue of the London Morning Post, Malcolm Muggeridge depicted the following scene:

"If you go now to the Ukraine or the North Caucasus, exceedingly beautiful countries and formerly amongest the most fertile in the world, you will find them like a desert; fields choked with weeds and neglected; no livestock or horses; villages deserted; peasants famished, often their bodies swollen, unutterably wretched.

"You will discover if you question them that they have had no bread at all for three months past; only potatoes and some millet, and they are now counting potatoes one by one. . . . They will tell you that many have already died of famine and that many are dying every day; that thousands have been shot by the government and hundreds of thousands exiled."

The devastation Mr. Muggeridge described wasn't caused by any natural catastrophe. It was an entirely new phenomenon—history's first artificial famine: a consequence of Stalin's effort to collectivize agriculture and crush the nationally conscious Ukrainian peasantry.

With the exception of Mr. Muggeridge's reports, William Henry Chamberlin's in the Christian Science Monitor, and the publication of several stories and a number of shocking photographs of starving children in the Hearst newspapers, the Western press was largely silent about the genocide that was occurring in the Soviet Ukraine. Europe and the U.S. were in the throes of the Great Depression. Violence in the streets was common. Fascism was on the march. The forced famine of 1933 had regrettably come at an inopportune time.

Some reporters from the West concealed the truth because of an ideological commitment to Soviet communism. Others, like New York Times correspondent Walter Duranty, were seduced by official favors and access to high government circles into deliberately and shamelessly attempting to suppress the story of the famine, while writing fawning articles on Stalin's rule. For this Mr. Duranty was rewarded with Pulitzer prizes and the Order of Lenin.

None of the day's newspaper reports was able to grasp the enormity of the cataclysm. Today, reliable academic estimates place the number of Ukrainian victims of starvation at 4.5 million to 7 million. This dark event, which rivals in its magnitude the Jewish Holocaust and the massacre of the Cambodians by the Khmer Rouge, is still largely unknown outside the private memories of some survivors.

The famine was in part the byproduct of Stalin's relentless drive to collectivize Soviet agriculture. That starvation was artificially induced is beyond dispute. The famine was a clear result of the fact that between 1931 and 1933, while harvests were precipitously declining, Stalin's commissars continued to requisition and confiscate ever-increasing quantities of grain, much of it exported to Western Europe. Peasants were shot and deported as rich, landowning "kulaks." Most livestock perished from the lack of feed, some as a result of peasant attempts to resist collectivization. Cannibalism was not uncommon. Although no medical quarantine was declared and non-Ukrainians were free to travel into and out of the area, starving villagers who sought to flee areas stricken with famine and its resulting outbreaks of pneumonia, typhus, and tuberculosis were turned back at checkpoints controlled by Soviet patrols that scrupulously enforced newly imposed internal passport regulations.

While the drive to collectivize agriculture was a wideranging phenomenon common to the entire U.S.S.R., only in the Ukraine did it assume a genocidal character. Indeed, there can be no question that Stalin used the forced famine as part of a political strategy whose aim was to crush all vestiges of Ukrainian national sentiment. As he wrote, "The nationality problem is by its essence a peasant problem." The attack against the "kulaks," therefore, was viewed as an attack against the social basis of Ukrainian nationalism. Moreover, the famine was accompanied by an extensive purge in the cities of the Ukrainian cultural and political elite whose leading activists had been the precursors of a national communism similar to that which later emerged in Tito's Yugoslavia and Gomulka's Poland.

Some might ask whether today it is worthwhile to dredge up the memory of yet another act of Stalinist barbarism. What can this event from a dim and receding past tell us that Solzhenitsyn's "Gulag Archipelago" has not? One might be tempted to say that nothing new can be learned from this secret horror. Yet the 1933 famine is important for both moral and political reasons.

There is of course our moral obligation to honor the memory of the nameless victims by depicting the truth. Moreover, it is important to understand the forced famine as a pivotal event in Soviet history, whose consequences remain to this day.

For the famine created a disastrous situation in Soviet agriculture from which the U.S.S.R. still hasn't fully recovered. Moreover, the famine eliminated a substantial segment of the U.S.S.R.'s non-Russian population, thus ensuring that the Soviet Union would remain for the next five decades a state dominated by an absolute Russian majority. Finally, the famine caused an enormous rift within the Ukrainian nation, which had long been nationally assertive. To this day, independent and national sentiment among Eastern Ukrainians is much lower than among Western Ukrainians (who, in 1933, as part of Poland, were spared the trauma of the famine and the Great Terror).

Yet despite the pivotal importance of the forced famine, for 50 years its full story has remained untold. Not one serious book on this tragedy is available in English.

Today—at a time when some would recast Soviet communism in a friendlier mold, the better to negotiate arms reductions with—may once again be an inopportune time to bring up the terrible loss of life and the painful trauma of the brutally scarred Ukrainian nation. Yet 50 years seems too long to remain silent about one of the greatest crimes in mankind's history.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, we have been in morning business for a little while. I think if there is a need for morning business, the leadership will make a provision for it later in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I might announce that there is no way to tell, since there is no time agreement, but I would expect the first vote at 10 a.m., or shortly thereafter, on the pending question, which is amendment No. 2231, as modified. I do not know that, but I would suggest Senators take account of an early morning vote today.

Mr. President, there are no other Senators on the floor seeking recognition in morning business. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Vermont may proceed notwithstanding the time limitation so that he may begin his speech on the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORIZATION FOR FURTHER U.S. PARTICIPATION IN MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN LEBANON

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution now be laid before the Senate and made the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senate will now resume consideration of the pending business, Senate Joint Resolution 159, which the clerk will state.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159) to authorize the further participation of U.S. Armed Forces in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I repeat that I expect there will be a vote on this amendment sometime this morning and my guess is it will be sometime shortly after 10 a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I spent this past weekend in Vermont, a trip, I might add, that is even more pleasurable at this time of the year than at other times. It is always, of course, a great pleasure to go up there. I usually try each week to spend 2 or 3 days in Vermont, primarily going around the State, listening to people, talking to people. I will go back up there again either tomorrow night or Saturday morning, as I will do most weekends for the remainder of the year.

The thing I heard the most from voters this past weekend were discussions about Lebanon and our policy there.

Mr. President, I originally opposed President Reagan's decision to send U.S. marines into Beirut. In my view, we should have taken the lead, in cooperation with other friendly powers, in expanding the United Nations' peacekeeping force there instead. This would have avoided the terrible risk of our direct involvement in the morass of the Lebanese civil war.

However, once the President committed our men, I reluctantly gave my support, so long as the role of the marines was clearly understood to be carefully limited and short-term. You may recall they were going to be out by Christmas.

As I understood the President's policy, the marines were not to become engaged in the Lebanese civil war. They were only to help give the new Lebanese Government of President Gemayel a breathing space. Frankly, even then I was very uneasy about whether the marines really could be kept out of the fighting among the Lebanese religious and political factions.

Now, with a growing list of dead and wounded Americans, I see no convincing evidence that the President has a coherent policy, either for the marines in Lebanon or for the Middle East as a whole. As I travel through Vermont, I find, as I said before, my constituents see no justification for risking the lives of American young men. If Vermont is any indication—and I believe it is—the American people do not support this venture.

The marines in Lebanon are now in precisely the situation foreseen by the war powers resolution. That resolution was adopted to give Congress a share in any decision to send U.S. forces into hostilities. The counterarguments offered by Secretary Shultz notwithstanding, I have no doubt that the war powers resolution applies to the marines in Lebanon. Our marines are obviously in the midst of hostilities. They are drawing combat pay. They are being shot at. They are returning fire. They most tragically, as we have seen in watching the caskets being removed from airplanes here, are dying in Lebanon. Those are hostilities. There is no other way to describe it.

The President legally should begin withdrawing them within 60 days unless Congress specifically approves keeping them there longer.

We are now debating a resolution which would authorize the President to keep the marines in Lebanon for 18 months. Others, dubious of such a long blank check, want to specify some lesser time.

As far as I am concerned, the marines have already done what they were sent to do.

They were sent over, we were told, and the American people were told, to buy time for the Gemayel government. They bought time for the Gemayel government. We are reaching a point where we should say that this is a conflict of Lebanon's, not a conflict of the United States. We bought time for them and we should let them put their house in order.

Really, we should now do what that wise old Vermont Senator, George Aiken, said about Vietnam: Let's announce that we won and get out!

Obviously, the President is determined not to do that. He would like us simply to endorse his actions without any time limit whatever, or any application of the war powers resolution as though we learned absolutely nothing from Vietnam.

It bothers me and worries me that any President, Democratic or Republican, would assume that the war powers resolution does not apply, or that for some reason, the war powers resolution is not relevant.

Apparently, however, the President is reluctantly prepared to accept a time limit. After Secretary Shultz statement that the President would not necessarily feel bound by any congressionally-imposed time limit provoked a furor across the country, the President now says his intention would be to seek legislative approval of any change in the marines' mission.

The President seems to ignore the fact that the marines mission has been carried out, at least as it was described to us before, thus giving us a reason to leave.

Mr. President, this is a game of words. It reminds me of the way we slid, step by step, into the Vietnam tradegy.

I am convinced the war powers resolution must be invoked and Congress must share responsibility for whether the marines stay or leave. The right way to do that is for us to invoke the operative clause of the war powers resolution since the President will not. We should not attempt to set any time limit. The President should come to this body and tell us what he intends to do and how long it will take. He must be very clear about what our forces are to accomplish by their presence.

I ask the question how he plans to avoid getting our marines dragged into Lebanon's civil war, a civil war that quite tragically and unfortunately I expect will probably outlast every one of us in this Chamber.

It is time Congress had a major debate on Middle East policy. Events have been drifting out of control there ever since the Camp David peace process ran out of steam. A year ago, heartened by President Reagan's attempt to revive the stalled peace negotiations, I offered my support in working out a bipartisan consensus on America's Middle East policy. I spoke to that effect on this floor. I wrote to the White House in that regard. I said that I wanted to be able to help do the impossible up here. I never even so much as received the courtesy of a form letter, not even the kind that schoolchildren get when they send a letter to the White House.

So much for any attempt on the part of the White House to seek bipartisan support in the Senate. There just was no response.

History has repeatedly shown that no policy in the Middle East can succeed without a broad, bipartisan consensus in Congress. Without that, the President will lack the essential political base for seeking the difficult compromises from all parties that are vital for peace. For the factions and parties in the Middle East must see a united American Government and people behind our policy if it is to have any chance to succeed.

If I could say what I wish Congress would do, it would be to invoke the War Powers Act without setting the 18-month time limit. The President should then come back and tell us specifically what he is going to do, why, and how, and then let us debate a time based on his estimates.

Absent that, I will vote against the 18-month time limit. I will vote for the resolution proposed by Senator BYRD and Senator NUNN and others which provides a shorter limit. If this passes, I will keep an open mind about what the President comes back with. I would hope the President would seek a bipartisan consensus for whatever policy is laid down in Lebanon, and I would work with my colleauges on both sides of the aisle to try to find a date and a time to do that. Quite frankly, had we done that years ago in Southeast Asia, we never would have ended up in Vietnam. We never would have ended up with 55,000 Americans killed and hundreds and hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese on both sides killed. We would not have ended up with the billions of dollars spent. We would not have ended up transforming the whole political system in Vietnam. We would not have ended up with the slipping of American prestige around the world, had we followed the same steps that we could follow here today.

I think, Mr. President, we ought to look back to that. It is hard to find anybody in this Chamber, or in the other body, who supported the war in Vietnam. Yet, of course, the war in Vietnam was funded every year by the Congress, usually by an overwhelming majority. Let us not start down that slippery slope. Even though we are told by the Joint Chiefs of Staff that they can now see the light at the end of the tunnel in Lebanon.

I am afraid that we are not only repeating old mistakes, but, unfortunately, we seem to be even repeating the old speeches which led to those mistakes. If we see the light at the end of the tunnel, next we will hear that we will win the hearts and the minds of the people, and on and on.

Now is the time to say, "Halt, enough." We have a War Powers Act passed by overwhelming majorities of both parties in the House and the Senate. Let us show that its passage was not just a political sop to constituents at the time. Let us show it really was intended to be the law of the land and each of us, having taken the oath of office in this Chamber, will uphold the law of the land. The law is the law is the law, and we will follow it.

Mr. President, I yield the floor. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, as we debate the War Powers Act, there are a few things we are not trying to do. Congress is not trying to run a war. That is the sole responsibility of the Executive, the President of the United States. We are not presupposing that Congress will decide to pull the troops out of Lebanon. We are debating whether or not our Founding Fathers decided it was the responsibility of one person to send our sons and daughters into war or whether they meant that question to be decided by the collective representatives of the people, the U.S. Congress.

This debate on Senate Joint Resolution 159 is important for several reasons. It is going to set the precedent for the future implementation of the War Powers Act. It will determine the question of Congress ability to measure up to its constitutional role on issues of war and peace. It is important because U.S. marines have been wounded and they have been killed in Lebanon without congressional authorization for their presence in that country.

As we began consideration of this resolution, we learned that the United States was instrumental in negotiating a cease-fire in Lebanon. I certainly think the President ought to be applauded for that. That is a substantial achievement and I join my colleagues in hoping that this accomplishment will lead to additional success in securing an enduring peace.

It would be a mistake, Mr. President, for anyone to believe that the substitute that was introduced by the minority leader presupposes that Congress will decide to remove the marines from Lebanon. What will happen is the White House will be guaranteed a vote on additional authorization for the troops' involvement. That is provided by the statute. Assuming that the President will make his case with Congress, which in my opinion he has not yet done, Congress would then share in the responsibility for keeping troops in Lebanon.

Senate Joint Resolution 159 is not the precedent that I hoped we would establish. If you will recall, Mr. President, the senior Senator from Maryland said this ought to be a corporate decision, one made by both Congress and the President. I think he is absolutely right. This resolution is more on the order of a solo act on the part of Congress. The administration still refuses to acknowledge the constitutional requirement that the Congress authorize deployment of our Armed Forces in case of hostilities, the President's letter to the senior Senator from Illinois notwithstanding. This is not what our Nation's forefathers intended.

I know the constitutional arguments, Mr. President. I have heard the assertions of those who would advocate, as this administration does, an unlimited power on the part of the Chief Executive to engage in war.

Studying the constitutional precedents, I believe that the greater weight of legal argument is against unilateral Presidential warmaking authority. Of course, the President is empowered to act as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, to direct the troops. But Congress alone is vested with the authority to initiate wars.

Mr. President, I have some serious reservations about this resolution. The President still has not notified Congress that our marines are involved in hostilities abroad, as section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution demands. The administration still refuses to acknowledge that our marines are involved in hostilities. Tell that to the marines.

The administration continues to reject the notion that Congress has a role to play in authorizing the deployment of troops in hostilities. The President refuses to be bound by this resolution. The Secretary of State holds the view that no congressional authorization is necessary to increase the number of troops or the scope of their involvement in Lebanon. He says that if we pass this resolution and the marines remain in Lebanon past the 18 months, then, in fact, no additional authorization will be needed.

Mr. President, 18 months is a very long time to authorize our marines to be involved in war. If you think it is a long time for us, think how long a time it is for those marines. Think how long a time it is for the mothers and fathers worrying about those marines.

During World War II, my unit in Europe lost 100 percent of its table of organization of flying personnel in 1 year's operation.

The senior Senator from Hawaii has referred to the fact that in World War I, 116,516 Americans gave their lives in 19 months, that only 11 months expired between the invasion at Normandy and the surrender of the Third Reich. I would add that in the Middle East, we are dealing with an area that has a history of short and very bloody wars. We are talking about high-technology warfare, massive losses of life. The Six-Day War in October of 1967 took the lives of 11,679 Israelis, Syrians, Jordanians, and Egyptians.

Mr. President, I join with my friend from Hawaii in saying that 18 months is much too long.

I listened to one of my friends the other day ask, what is the purpose? If the purpose is to win, then we do not have enough. If the purpose is to die, then we have too many.

Mr. President, this is a meaningless resolution. It places no bounds on the President's deployment of troops in the hostilities.

Yesterday I heard the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee give us the vote on the House side by which they passed the House companion resolution. I read in this morning's paper the vote of the people and the latest poll overwhelming saying that 18 months is too long.

I will tell you how long 18 months are. That is long enough to see your mother's hair turn gray by the time you get back. The President says he is going to reluctantly sign this resolution, but he hardly acknowledges the principle of the role of Congress in decisions involving sending America's young men into war.

This resolution is no more than an act of congressional self-gratification. Once it is passed, and my guess is it is going to pass, the Congress can claim we have averted a great constitutional impasse. Baloney. We will have averted the impasse by sidestepping it. As the Secretary of State asserted in the hearing on this measure, the resolution preserves the constitutional question as a question.

This is a solo act by the Congress. The administration does not support this resolution. The best they can say about Senate Joint Resolution 159 is that they can live with it. The administration and Congress ought to be working together on this one, but unfortunately we are going our separate ways.

Mr. President, on matters as important as war and peace, at a time when American lives are at stake, the least this country needs is distrust between the administration and the Congress. Unfortunately, though, a kind of adversarial proceeding has sprung up: whenever Congress suggests that the President comply with the law of the land and notify Congress as required by section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Act, it meets with an automatic rejection at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. Our intent, Mr. President, is to be cooperative, to work in tandem with the administration because the objective is the national good and not political gain. But the administration refuses to join in such a partnership, and that makes bipartisanship a pretty tough proposition.

This resolution has been billed as a bipartisan compromise. Now, that may be accurate in the other body but it sure does not apply in the Senate. To me, bipartisanship connotes a partnership in which the independence is equal, the dependence is mutual, and the obligations are clearly stated. That is not the case with our deployment in Lebanon, nor is it the case with this resolution.

Mr. President, our Nation is a government of laws and men, and those who have been chosen to lead us have an obligation to conduct the workings of government in a manner that commands faith and instills confidence. To be effective in America, Government must inspire trust and convince the governed that their interests are being served, protected, and represented.

It is also incumbent on our Nation's leaders to obey the law. That is what they are written for. No one in this country is above it, and that includes the President of the United States. Sure, each of us knows of some policy or rule we disagree with, but that does not give us the license to violate the law. The President has refused to obey the war powers resolution. This is not a question of procedure. This is a question of substance to our Nation. He has refused to notify the Congress as the law requires, standing behind a blatantly false notion that our marines are not involved in hostilities. Until the President complies with the law, I find it very difficult to offer my support on this issue. If he is not going to comply now, there is no reason to believe he is going to comply in the future, either with the war powers resolution or Senate Resolution 159.

Mr. President, I yield back the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENTSEN. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I compliment the Senator from Texas. He has made a very fine speech. I wish others were here to listen, but I am sure they are listening on their loudspeakers. That is where I first heard the Senator and listened for a while. I wanted to come to the floor and compliment him on his speech.

He is correct in what he says. No man in this country is above the law, and the President himself is included in that statement. The Constitution expressly states that the President shall see to it that the "laws are faithfully executed." Any President has the right to veto a bill, and any President has the right to base that veto on his constitutional viewpoint. He can say he is vetoing a bill because he does not think it is constitutional, but this bill that the Senator is talking about was passed during the tenure of one of the predecessors of this President; namely, Mr. Nixon. So it was no longer a bill that today's President could veto. In fact, it was a bill that President Nixon did veto. And it was overridden by a super majority of 4 to 1 in this Senate, and by 2 to 1 in the other body. So it is now the law, it has been the law, and this President should execute the law. At some point perhaps there will be a court case, but the American people are in support of the law and they are in support of its being upheld. They are concerned about the so-called bipartisan compromise that was worked out. I, like the Senator, would wish to support this President, but he refuses to observe the statute that was on the books when he was sworn into office.

I commend the Senator on his statement.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I would like to say to the distinguished minority leader that the dedication, effort, and leadership that he has shown on this issue has been something that has been needed and which will well serve the Republic.

When I came to the Senate in 1971, they had a custom that carried a lot more weight in those days, and that was a Senator's maiden speech. For your maiden speech, you chose something you thought was the most important issue facing the Senate in that session. As a freshman that year I chose the War Powers Act.

If you are going to have representative government, where else do you want it but when you decide whether or not the citizens of this country live or die. I thought it was terribly important that we reaffirm that, particularly after Vietnam. I had just returned from being over there and hanging out of a helicopter at Quang Tri and going into Laos and Cambodia. I thought, "My God, this just must not happen again without the representatives of the people being a part of it and facing up to that responsibility."

Now, we could cop out like I think this resolution does, but that is not what we hired out for. We are supposed to face up to that responsibility. That is what I think we ought to do.

I think the Senator has shown the kind of leadership we need with his amendment. Mr. Leader, it is not going to pass, and that is unfortunate. The day will come when a lot of people will regret it did not pass. Those who say we are just talking about procedures could not be more wrong. We are talking about substance and we are talking about our Constitution.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DODD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, first of all, let me commend my colleague from Texas, Senator BENTSEN, for his statement and particularly his very last comment about the significance of this vote we are about to take on the substitute being proposed by the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. BYRD).

I was not a Member of this body in the early 1970's when the War Powers Resolution became the law of the land by the often-stated overwhelming majority of two to one overriding a Presidential veto. Not being privy to the intimate details of that debate but certainly aware of the momentous decision that Congress made in deciding to pass the War Powers Resolution, I suggest that the decision we are about to make this morning is in fact just as important as the decision to pass the War Powers Resolution in the first place. That was a procedural vote, a vote to determine whether or not a certain process ought to be in place to deal with a given situation. There may have been a number of instances since the early 1970's when one could have argued that the War Powers Resolution should have been invoked.

I suspect that there might have been significant debate whether or not the given fact situations actually merited the invocation of the War Powers Resolution.

I do not believe there is anyone in this body or in the other body or in fact anyone who has paid any attention at all to the events in Lebanon over the past 2 or 3 months who would argue that we are not confronted with the fact situation which was specifically envisioned by the framers of the War Powers Resolution. This is exactly the kind of situation that those who argued for the War Powers Resolution envisioned when they passed that historical resolution.

Therefore, for this body or the other to not invoke the provisions of that resolution at the very time we are confronted with the fact situation which the framers intended to be covered by that resolution, I think is to make a mistake which will be as historical a mistake as it would have been not to have passed the War Powers Resolution in the first place. So not having been present during those days, I am a little bit reluctant to make that kind of a statement, but I believe this decision we will make today is as important as the decision was to pass the War Powers Resolution in the first place.

I remind, although there are not many here this morning of those who will support the present resolution before us, that is the Baker-Percy resolution, that the day will come when another President maybe of another party confronted with a fact situation not dissimilar from the one we are confronted with today will have to look back on their votes today and question whether or not they did the right thing by opposing what the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. BYRD) has suggested by his substitute. And that is to put the Government on the right track when it comes to the War Powers Resolution and the provisions which would require the action that it envisioned.

Mr. President, this is not the first time that many of us in the Senate, Democrats and Republicans alike, have questioned the presence of U.S. Marines in Lebanon. I happen to have been in Beirut a year ago in July when the decision was made by President Reagan to send in the marines at that particular time. I recall then looking around Beirut, Tyre and Sidon, where I was and wondering how we are ever going to possibly make any sense out of the political chaos, putting aside the military chaos, that existed in the country. It was impossible for me to envision how you could possibly bring together the 13 various Christian factions, the Shiites, the Sunnis, the Druze, the Syrians, the various factions of the PLO. All of these various elements reminded me of the Rubik cube in effect trying to put this all together so that it made some sense. I expressed strong reservations about utilizing the U.S. Marines, simply because I thought it would complicate our primary role there, a diplomatic role, and that by bringing in U.S. forces we would have to be very conscious of their safety, we would have to be conscious of the potential role they would play in a military context at the very hour we were trying to serve a diplomatic function.

The Lebanese conflict remains as it has for hundreds of years, an internal one, a civil war waged by factions far too numerous to count, each heavily armed and each far too eager to shoot at each other. A bad decision has not been improved by time. The fact the marines have been deployed represents nothing more I feel than the implementation of a bad decision, as many, if not most of us realized at the time.

That decision has made us part of the Lebanese tragedy. The just-announced cease-fire obviously is welcome news but it must not blind us to the fact our participation is growing daily. Our troop strength has increased 25 percent from 1,200 to 1,600. In addition, 2,000 more U.S. combat forces wait offshore. Some press accounts based on Pentagon data assert there are at least 12,000 U.S. military personnel ashore or off the coast of Lebanon if you include all the military elements there. More than seven times the 1,600 figure. The battleship New Jersey, with a firepower capability in excess of all other warships in the area, has just arrived and is on station.

The tragedy is that American blood already has been spilled. We have watched the coffins come home. In fact, we have started a body count in Lebanon.

For what purpose? If the President knows what the purpose is he seems to be unwilling to say. If the Secretary of State knows what it is, then he has apparently decided to keep it a secret. If the National Security Advisor knows, he is unable to articulate it. And if the Secretary of Defense knows, he is refusing to talk. Nor can the media explain why we remain in Lebanon. It is as much a mystery to them as it is to the rest of us. Our policy in Lebanon, frankly is, a national mystery. It is a puzzle and a riddle.

Once again, for unknown and unclear reasons we find ourselves supporting yet another government which obviously does not find itself in command of a situation or apparently with the support of a great number of its own people—witness the willingness of so many Lebanese to engage in the conflict that we find in Lebanon in the process, considering the chaotic path we are following, the tragedy pervading Lebanon becomes an American tragedy as well. Compounding one tragedy certainly with another will not help Lebanon and it certainly is not going to help the United States.

Mr. President, I am supporting the alternative being offered by the minority leader, Senator BYRD. It is far superior to the so-called compromise resolution now before us—a resolution I opposed as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. The Byrd alternative—by explicitly invoking the War Powers Resolution, by demanding from this administration a sense of policy, purpose, and mission in Lebanon by imposing a more rational time limit—succeeds where the so-called compromise fails. It is not, however, the resolution I would have preferred to see before the Senate.

Mr. President, in my view we should be considering the safe and orderly withdrawal of U.S. troops from Lebanon, recognizing that the facts which made the marine deployment objectionable more than 1 year ago have not changed.

The resolution I would have preferred calls for the safe and orderly withdrawal of U.S. military forces from Lebanon beginning October 15 of this year, with such withdrawal to be completed within 90 days. This resolution would allow for an extension or other congressional disposition of the matter during this period if prior to the end of the 90 days the President reports to Congress pursuant to section 4a(1) of the War Powers Resolution.

This resolution would recognize the essential facts in the case: Our military forces in Lebanon are in an untenable and dangerous position; it is not within their power to resolve the Lebanese conflict; their continued presence in Lebanon may serve as much to heighten the conflict as to reduce it. If nothing else, this resolution would allow us to take advantage of the current cease-fire arrangement and begin the process of removing our forces under the best conditions we are likely to get.

Mr. President, I am not introducing this resolution. I do not want to further complicate an already complicated debate. Were this resolution introduced, those who support the President and who are prepared to expend more blood and more treasure in Lebanon will surely talk of cutting and running, of an unwillingness to stand by our friends, or of undermining the President. My response to them is straightforward: the charges do not apply.

No American elected to represent his or her fellow citizens—from the President down—has the right to put a single soldier in the trenches anywhere in the world without giving that soldier the best reason possible for being there. President Reagan, unfortunately, has failed to provide such a reason to the marines and to the American people, to provide any clear statement of policy or purpose, refusing to abide by the law of the land. The so-called compromise condones this silence. It leaves our marines dodging bullets in Lebanese foxholes for another 18 months—unclear about why they are there and why they are putting their lives on the line.

Those marines deserve a lot better and until we can give them more, until we can justify their sacrifices, I believe we have a moral and a national obligation to bring them home. Those marines are doing their duty. Until we bring them home or provide a clear and substantial reason for them to stay, we must admit that we are not doing ours.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of which I have spoken today be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, as I said earlier, I will not introduce this resolution for consideration but present it as the alternative I would have preferred to see the Senate approve.

Again, Mr. President, I commend the minority leader for what I think is a most thoughtful substitute to the 18 months. I think it not only preserves the constitutional process, but I think substantively it puts us in a far better position to make the kinds of decisions and resolve the questions which remain around the Lebanese conflict.

I yield the floor.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This joint resolution may be cited as the "Disengagement from Lebanon resolution".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. Congress finds that—

(1) the continuing civil strife in Lebanon makes it uncertain whether the United States Armed Forces in Lebanon can fulfill the purpose of their mission as stated in the exchange of letters dated September 25, 1982, between the Government of the United States and the Government of Lebanon;

(2) the circumstances necessitating the continuing presence of the United States Armed Forces in Lebanon remain unclear;

(3) the constitutional and legislative authority for the continuing presence of the United States Armed Forces in Lebanon is undefined;

(4) the estimated scope and duration of the hostilities or United States military involvement in Lebanon are unspecified; and

(5) the President has refused to admit the obligation to comply with section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution which requires a submission by the President to the Congress of a report on the introduction of United States Armed Forces into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances.

DISENGAGEMENT AND WITHDRAWAL OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES FROM LEBANON

SEC. 3. Beginning no later than October 15, 1983, the President shall initiate the disengagement and the safe and orderly withdrawal of United States Armed Forces from Lebanon, with such disengagement and withdrawal to be completed within a period of ninety days, unless prior to the end of such period the President has submitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the President pro tempore of the Senate a report pursuant to section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, the Baker-O'Neill resolution is entitled the "Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution." I believe it is, in reality, the Tonkin Gulf resolution of the Middle East. It is my hope that somehow all of this will work out to our best interests, but the risks to the contrary are dangerous.

My colleagues need not rush to the Senate floor to explain the differences between Vietnam in 1964 and Lebanon in 1983. I assure the Senate that I am aware of the differences—and there are many. My point is that, regardless of the well-meaning intentions of the sponsors and supporters of this resolution, the end result could well be very much the same as the 1960's in Southeast Asia. We never seem to learn.

Fifteen months ago, who would have thought that U.S. ground forces would or should have been deployed in the Middle East? I dare say that none of my colleagues would have recommended such a course of action, yet look where we are today.

We have shied away from the further involvement of U.S. ground forces in the Middle East, Asia, and Africa since the experiences in Korea and Vietnam. Even in 1973, when our staunch ally Israel was in real danger of being overrun during the Yom Kippur war, we did not deploy our own ground forces. Exhaustive resupply—yes. Deployments of naval forces—yes. An increased U.S. defense readiness posture—yes. Deployment of ground forces—no.

Mr. President, the world has seen many different types of conflicts caused by many different aspirations—territorial ambitions. Communist desire to spread their ideology, dictatorial grand visions and many others. However, if warfare can be so classified, the worst kind is religious warfare. Lebanon is the classic case of the latter with the three major religions involved. The U.S. has no business being militarily involved in the middle of a Middle East civil war that has been going on for decades. It is true that to some extent in Lebanon

Soviet-American interests are involved. It is tragic that we have been maneuvered again into committing troops as we did in Korea and Vietnam, while they refused to do so.

Over a year ago, when we mistakenly took our first step to obligate troops, the President assured Congress that our marines would depart if fired upon and that there was no "intention or expectation" that U.S. forces would become involved in hostilities. What has changed since then to the time and place that we find ourselves involved today? As of the time of the latest cease-fire, 5 marines have been killed and 38 wounded. In short, our policy has failed. However, it has failed more because it was flawed in the first place than because of the changed circumstances which have occurred. Our so-called national interest in Lebanon has never been fully defined and we are plunging ahead as if it had been.

Whenever ground forces are introduced, a particular situation takes on a whole new meaning and future options are foreclosed somewhat. Ground forces are not withdrawn as easily as air or naval forces. If you deploy ground forces, they generally stay until the job is finished. Troops under such conditions become a tripwire where we are pulled in, deeper and deeper, to protect our investment in manpower. Pride oftentimes can get in the way of rational actions. Now I ask my colleagues, "when will Lebanon, indeed when will the Middle East, ever be secure and stable enough to remove our ground forces?" When I asked that question 1 year ago, there was no answer. The President, to this day, admits that even he cannot answer that question, nor has he ever outlined what his goals are and when it is likely to happen.

Mr. President, to be sure, the hand of the Soviet Union—this time through Syria—is being played in Lebanon. It must make the Kremlin leaders joyous to see the United States involved and bogged down militarily, with marines literally handcuffed in their foxholes as far as taking any real action to protect themselves. The Soviets must be delighted to see us involved in a Middle East conflict of long-standing duration with little hope for an end in sight. Once again, the Soviets have outfoxed us into a military involvement far from our shores pitted against their proxies. Once again American, not Russian, blood is being shed.

The introduction of U.S. ground forces has now set a terrible precedent from which there may be no acceptable escape. Other Middle East nations will ask in the future. "If you took that step for Lebanon in 1982 and 1983, why won't you do that for me during my time of trouble?" And trouble will surely come in the future in the Middle East. The introduction of U.S. forces in the Middle East will become the new "litmus test" of U.S. support and resolve much like the sale of AWACS aircraft to Saudi Arabia in 1981. Where does this road end?

The U.S. policy in the area is being shaped by events rather than the other way around.

Mr. President, I believe that we should continue our generous financial, material and diplomatic support Lebanon. An independent Lebanon free of external forces and made whole again has always been, and should still be, a U.S. goal. The tragedy of present day Lebanon is indeed great and we have a supporting role to play.

However, Mr. President, we are taking matters here in reverse order. I have heard more than one of my colleagues say that this resolution will settle the dispute between the executive and legislative branches of our Government so that we can get on with debating and deciding what our role in Lebanon and overall Middle East policy will be. Think of it—we are about to give the Senate's stamp of approval for a long-term commitment of ground forces and then figure out the reason for and duration of their stay and how it fits into our policy. This is where our decision-making has come up short and, in my mind, is not only flawed, but seriously confused. We indeed are putting the cart ahead of the horse.

Instead of authorizing our forces to stay in Lebanon at least another 18 months, we should be figuring out how best to remove them. We cannot immediately "cut and run." But we certainly should be involved in an all-out effort to keep from becoming further embroiled in a military way in the Middle East. True, this resolution does include the provision which invokes the proper clause of the War Powers Resolution. I thank the President for finally being persuaded to halfheartedly obey the law, although belatedly and only under pressure. We should stop there and review the situation again in 60 to 90 days as called for in the law. Instead, we are about to authorize an open-ended, somewhat blind commitment to a Middle East military involvement.

In closing, Mr. President, I understand the feeling that our forces have already been committed and that the "fat is in the fire"—like it or not. Many will support the President and the resolution offered by the majority leader, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Many will support it despite their misgivings because of the prestige and the influence of the people who are the sponsors of this resolution. However, if Congress is to have no role, why do we try to participate in foreign policy? I thought the Senator from Tennessee brilliantly addressed this issue on the Senate floor yesterday.

The main thing that concerns this Senator is not the legalities of the situation and not whether someone's turf is going to be tramped on if the War Powers Resolution is not involved. I think entirely too much discussion has been on the legalistic side of this question, when we have policy and human lives involved.

Even though we only have one President, and he should be given the benefit of the doubt on tough questions involving close judgment calls, the stationing of U.S. forces in Lebanon for an extended period of time in these circumstances is not the proper course of action.

Mr. President, the Byrd resolution, of which I am a cosponsor, is before us. It is the only viable, workable alternative we have in view of the facts that confront us as of today. I urge its adoption.

(Mr. COHEN assumed the chair.)

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY HIS EXCELLENCY, THE FOREIGN MINISTER OF OMAN

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee has a most prominent and distinguished visitor in the Chamber at this time. I wish to yield to the chairman so he may introduce our guest. After he has done so, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess for 1 minute so we may greet our fellow Parliamentarian.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY YEARS OF RELATIONS WITH THE SULTANATE OF OMAN

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, September 21, 1983, marked the 150th anniversary of the establishment of treaty relations between the United States and the Sultanate. This was our first treaty with an Eastern Arab State. Relations between our two nations have been noted for true amity and a desire for mutually beneficial commerce.

Years ago I was honored to be the first U.S. Senator in history to ever visit Oman.

Ours was a relationship between two trading nations. For centuries, Omani sailors from Sohar, Muscat, and Sur had traded from China in the East to Africa in the West. They were among the preeminent merchants in the vast Indian Ocean region.

In 1833, Oman was significantly different. In that year, Oman included the East African coast from Cape Guardafui on the Horn of Africa to Cape Delgado on the Mozambique border. In South Asia, the Omanis held several key ports, the last of which they relinquished to Pakistan in 1958.

Relations with Oman have been unmarred for the past century and a half, although they have never been better or more extensive than they are today. His Majesty Sultan Qaboos, when he assumed power in 1970, began the transformation of his country into a modern state. One aspect of this process was to reinvigorate past international ties and play a more active role in the family of nations. In pursuing these goals, Oman has become an active friend of the United States and a proponent of moderation in a region of the world where outspoken friendship for the United States and moderation have often been criticized.

Regional radicalism has not curtailed Omani policy. The Government and people of Oman provide strategic facilities for American forces operating in the Indian Ocean region. Because of this cooperation, Oman is often criticized by radicals. When His Majesty Sultan Qaboos met with the Foreign Relations Committee last spring, he was asked why Oman stood firmly with the West when other regional states equivocated. He observed that Oman alone among the regional states had successfully surpressed a Soviet-backed attack. This experience sharply focused Omani attention on their shared security interests with the West.

The Omanis are also a moderating voice on Middle Eastern issues. Following President Sadat's signing of the Egyptian-Israeli Peace Treaty most of the nations of the Arab world sharply criticized the Egyptian President and severed diplomatic relations. The Omanis did not join the others. To the contrary, the Omani Government publicly commended the Egyptians. Moreover, the Omanis continue to speak out for a negotiated settlement to the Arab-Israeli dispute. They have supported direct negotiations with the Israelis as the proper course and have rejected radical demands for unending war.

Having friends like the Omanis is of great importance. Mutual interest and mutual respect have marked our relations for 150 years. I am certain that they will continue to do so for the next 150 years.

Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for at this time calling a 1-minute recess so that the Members of the Senate assembled may have the opportunity to personally shake hands with one of the great distinguished diplomats in the world today, His Excellency, the Foreign Minister of Oman, and his distinguished colleagues.

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now stand in recess for 1 minute.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 10:22 a.m., recessed until 10:23 a.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. COHEN).

The Senate continued with the consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159).

Mr. SASSER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise in support of the Byrd resolution and in opposition to Senate Joint Resolution 159 as reported from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

I support the Byrd resolution and oppose the Percy-Baker resolution for three basic reasons.

First, the Percy-Baker resolution does not set forth a clear and unambiguous foreign policy to govern our military involvement in Lebanon. That resolution perhaps offers a false hope that it may bring about a lasting peace in the poor, war-torn nation of Lebanon.

Second, Senate Joint Resolution 159, by its ambiguous wording, commits our country to play an ever wider role in Lebanon, something that was not clearly envisioned when the U.S. Marines first landed in Beirut to evacuate the PLO.

Finally, Senate Joint Resolution 159, which has been offered as a political compromise to the Lebanon situation, instead compromises the very nature of the War Powers Resolution.

Let me treat each of these points in some detail, Mr. President.

First, let us view the Lebanon situation for what it is. We are all heartened by the cease-fire that appears to be holding in Lebanon. But we also should not overlook the fact that since 1975, there have been more than 200 cease-fires in Lebanon. I certainly would like to see this cease-fire hold and peace come to the region, but the deep and enduring hatreds that have scarred this country are bound to surface again, and we should be prepared once again to see our Armed Forces being drawn into combat situations.

The Lebanon situation perhaps defies description. The Government of Lebanon probably holds a small part of the territory of this nation. Some have characterized President Gemayel as being only mayor of Beirut rather than President of Lebanon. The eastern portion of the country is occupied by Syrian troops and advisers. The northern portion of the country still feels the presence of the Palestine Liberation Organization, and Israeli forces remain strong in the south.

Lebanon has become a pawn in the ongoing struggles in the Middle East. The PLO has used Lebanon as a platform for staging raids into Israel. Syria has moved its armed forces into the region in order to maintain its influence in the factional struggles that have beset this nation, and Israel has taken strong, albeit temporary, measures to insure that adversaries do not use Lebanon as staging base to threaten Israel's security.

And in this international cauldron we call Lebanon, there is the continuing struggle between Christian and Moslem, a civil war that has bled this country for the past several years.

Sects of all description war on one another. Atrocities are commonplace, and there appears to be little organized effort to make Lebanon whole again.

This is a tragic situation, but we must accept the fact that peace for Lebanon must come fron within. The people of Lebanon must eventually put aside their hatreds and come together again if Lebanon is to survive as a sovereign state. And if the world community is to help the Lebanese in that effort, then the appropriate forum for that effort—the United Nations—should be called into play.

After all, the United Nations has had experience in dealing with such matters. It has helped keep the peace in Cyprus. It served with distinction in the Sinai.

In that regard, Mr. President, section 5(c) of the resolution states that not later than 1 year after enactment of this resolution, the United States shall discuss with the other members of the U.N. Security Council the establishment of a U.N. peacekeeping force to assume the responsibilities of the multinational force in Lebanon.

The timetable should be moved up. The world community would be best served if a large U.N. peacekeeping force were on the ground now in Lebanon. President Gemayel would also be well served, in the interests of national reconciliation, if he issued a call for the establishment of such a peacekeeping force to operate in Lebanon.

The multinational force that is now stationed in Lebanon certainly has tried to bring about a stabilization in the area. But the only truly multinational effort that may ever be fully successful in that effort should be a U.N. peacekeeping force.

I was interested to note that, just recently, the British Foreign Secretary, Sir Geoffrey Howe, said that a U.N. affiliation was desirable because of the experience and the readily available peacekeeping machinery of that body.

Hand in hand with that effort, of course, should be the process of reconciliation in Lebanon. President Gemayel is to be commended for his efforts in that regard.

But this process has a long, long way to go. Factions opposing the Gemayel government need to be brought into the reconciliation process perhaps with the eventual hope that a truly representative government in the region might be formed. A representative government that can tend to the internal needs of Lebanon and not allow itself to be drawn into larger Middle East struggles.

Without a truly representative government and without the combined force of world opinion working for peace in Lebanon, this poor country may become partitioned, and simply cease to exist in its entirety.

Before that occurs, we must face the fact that our Armed Forces could be drawn deeper and deeper into situations of armed conflict and combat, the dimensions of which will remain a mystery to the American people.

American service personnel will be killed and wounded, and their friends and relatives will never know why they have made that sacrifice.

That is precisely why the War Powers Act needs to be invoked in its current form. That is why we should vote for the Byrd resolution. By doing so, the administration will have to make an official report about the extend of our involvement in Lebanon, and a national debate about our foreign and military policy in Lebanon could occur.

I have no doubt that the administration could make a case in that regard.

I am not sure it would be convincing to this Senator, but at least, it ought to be part of the national dialog. So I say, let them make it.

Let it be the subject of debate in the Congress. And by that debate, I am confident that a national consensus about Lebanon could be developed.

Without such a consensus, further involvement of armed forces in Lebanon is a perilous policy.

I received, just yesterday, a communication from one of my constituents, a former marine who had served in the Vietnam war from 1962 to 1965. His son is now in the Marine Corps aboard the U.S.S. Fort Fischer en route to Lebanon. The father, who served his country for 3 years in the Marine Corps in Vietnam, is asking me, why should we ask our men to die for a policy that is not supported by the people of the United States. The father says,

> It is ridiculous, placing our marines in Lebanon without the support of our people or without our people even knowing why they are there.

Mr. President, I think that is why it is imperative that we have a national debate about what we are doing in Lebanon. That is why I think it is imperative that this administration come to Congress and go to the American people and tell them what it is all about.

And Mr. President, in all fairness, the compromise Percy-Baker resolution is not a vehicle of national consensus.

It is a compromise put together in order to help the administration avoid invoking the War Powers Resolution. It is a compromise that says we should not carefully debate the situation in Lebanon and make our foreign policy after such careful debate.

Mr. President, there is a better way.

By invoking the War Powers Act by the Byrd resolution, we can make a deliberate determination about the extent of our military role in Lebanon.

Let us be truthful about it Mr. President.

Our military role has expanded in Lebanon.

First, we evacuated the PLO from Beirut. Then, we agreed with the Government of Lebanon to be part of a multinational force and try to assist the Lebanese Government in restoring their authority and sovereignty to the Beirut area.

Now, we find ourselves responsible for the safety and security of the multinational force stationed in Lebanon and assisting the Lebanese Government in selected circumstances.

And what are these circumstances?

Well, we are vitally concerned about the safety and security of Suq-El-Gharb. This area controls the heights over Beirut. The Lebanese Army is trying to drive the Druze out of the area and protect the Beirut area.

Well, what happens if Suq-El-Gharb is taken by the Lebanese Government but threatened at a later date by the opponents of the Lebanese Government?

Do we send in air strikes or order naval bombardment against those seeking to retake this town on the outskirts of Beirut?

Where does the Beirut area end?

Will we soon find ouselves in action beyond the Sheef Mountains and in the Bekaa Valley?

If that is our aim, the American people have a right to know about it.

We have a major military contingent in Lebanon. We have considerable sea and air power to insure their security. But these forces can also most assuredly be used to help the Lebanese Government regain sovereignty over their nation.

Our destroyers have shelled positions in the Sheef Mountains. The battleship New Jersey can send its shells some 20 miles into the vicinity of the Bekaa Valley. Our Air Force can certainly humble the opponents of the Gemayel government.

The question is, Is that our aim? Is that why we are there?

Is that what we set out to do when the marines first set foot in Beirut to evacuate the PLO? Many, many Americans are not sure, and this Senator himself does not know.

We are entitled to debate on this issue. We should not have to wait another 18 months to find out what the full extent of our foreign and military policy in Lebanon is.

Finally, Mr. President, I must oppose Senate Joint Resolution 159 because it compromises the war powers resolution itself.

Mr. President, when the marines first went into Beirut, the chairman and ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee asked the administration to invoke the war powers resolution before doing so.

The administration refused.

When the marines went back into Lebanon with a multinational force over a year ago, the chairman and the ranking member renewed their request.

The administration once again refused to invoke the war powers resolution.

When the first marines were killed in Beirut, pressure mounted again to comply with the war powers resolution.

The administration demurred.

Now we have language which technically invokes the war powers resolution but in the same breath provides for an 18-month extension for our military presence in Lebanon.

We are not going to have any 60- or 90-day waiting period as called for in the War Powers Resolution.

We are not going to have the administration come forward with a full-scale official report on our military involvement in Lebanon as set forth in the war powers resolution.

No, we are being presented with a fait accompli.

We are being asked to station our troops in Lebanon for another 18 months and then we shall talk about a further authorization for our military involvement.

And the administration has already put us on notice that there could be greater involvement.

I am advised that, just yesterday, the Acting Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Adm. James Watkins, in testimony before the House Armed Services Committee, said that if we must have a timetable for our presence in Lebanon, 18 months is OK, but the clear implication was that our marines could be in Lebanon for years.

July 1985, I am advised, is the time when seven brigades of the Lebanese Army will be fully fleshed out and be ready for action and effective. I have a hunch that some are planning on our American Marines remaining there until July 1985, when the Lebanese Army will be up to full strength. Is that the hidden agenda here? We do not know, and this Congress and the American people have a right to know.

My able and distinguished colleague (Mr. SARBANES), before the Foreign Relations Committee and in debate on this floor, has noted that Secretary of State Shultz indicates that the President would "consult" with the Congress after the 18-month authorization in Senate Joint Resolution 159 was concluded. Secretary Shultz would have the President "consult" with the Congress about the possible expansion of our military involvement in Lebanon.

I submit that, despite the recent "clarification" about Secretary Shultz' remarks before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the administration still contends that it needs an open-ended policy for later military involvement in Lebanon.

I feel that is most unfortunate, Mr. President.

The real casualty in this whole chain of events, beyond the young marines who have lost their lives in Lebanon, has been the War Powers Resolution.

The administration has defied the Congress and it has gotten away with it.

As in so many other cases with this administration, compromise is a one-way street.

By Senate Joint Resolution 159, the administration seeks to avoid the dictates of the War Powers Act. That is a law that has been on the statute books since 1973, and that law is being negated by Senate Joint Resolution 159.

There is a better way. We can support the Byrd substitute. Let us obey the law, the law that extends to each and every American, even the President of the United States. Let us invoke the war powers resolution. Let us have the open debate about our foreign and military policy in Lebanon that ought to occur in a free country. That is the way we should deal with this situation at this moment in history.

Let me end on a personal note, Mr. President. There are about 40 men from my State involved in the peacekeeping force in Lebanon. How do I answer their mothers and their fathers and their wives and their relatives when they ask me, "Senator, why is my son in Lebanon? How long is he going to be there? What does our Government seek to do with his presence there?"

Mr. President, in truth I cannot answer my constituents. I do not know what our policy is in Lebanon. So, it is time that we had a national debate on this issue. It is time that the American people knew why our marines have been put in Lebanon. It is time that they know what our policy is there. It is time they know what the rules of engagement are. It is time they know what our ultimate goals are in that war-torn land. Only the Byrd substitute resolution will keep the war powers resolution intact. It will provide the American people with the opportunity to develop a national consensus about our foreign and military policy in Lebanon.

Mr. President, after two disastrous wars in Asia in less than 30 years, if we have not now learned the bitter lesson, that we must have a national consensus that our vital interests are at stake before engaging our troops in combat, then we shall never learn.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of Senate Joint Resolution 159, which provides authorization under the War Powers Resolution for continued U.S. involvement in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

This resolution specifically allows U.S. Marines to continue their participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon for up to 18 months after enactment. The resolution also requires the President to make periodic reports to Congress on the situation in Lebanon.

Mr. President, this resolution is the result of a compromise between the executive branch and the leaders of both Houses of Congress. It represents a much-needed agreement on an extremely sensitive issue. This compromise gives our marines in Lebanon a vote of confidence, and it sends a strong message to the Soviets, who wish to extend their control in the Middle East and bring about a collapse of the present Lebanese Government.

Mr. President, for years the people of Lebanon have suffered war and anguish, mainly because of the presence of outside forces, such as those of the Palestinian Liberation Organization and Syria, within Lebanese borders. At this point in history, we have an opportunity to help maintain a democratic and free Lebanon, with a government strong enough to defend its borders against outside interference. If we do not take this opportunity and allow our forces to continue a peacekeeping role in Lebanon, we are inviting the Soviets and their surrogates, Syria and the PLO, to destroy the fragile Gemayel government and establish an oppressive, totalitarian regime.

Mr. President, I will back this resolution in an effort to help develop Lebanese unity, independence, and territorial integrity. No region of the world is more vital to the foreign affairs of the United States than is the Middle East, and this resolution clearly furthers the interests of peace and security.

While I support this compromise resolution, Mr. President, I do so as one who has serious reservations about the wisdom of the War Powers Act, which has brought this debate before Congress. The writers of our Constitution and founders of our Nation clearly placed the responsibility of conducting foreign policy on the shoulders of the executive branch. The constitutional responsibility of the legislative branch is to simply advise and consent on matters of foreign policy, not to formulate or dictate such policy.

Mr. President, in order to have an orderly and effective foreign policy, it is essential that Congress respect this wise and necessary separation of constitutional powers. With 100 U.S. Senators and 435 Members of the House of Representatives, it would be virtually impossible for Congress to formulate expeditious and effective decisions on issues dealing with foreign affairs. The President of the United States, regardless of his political party affiliation, should be given broad latitude in conducting a unified international policy for the Government and citizens of this great Nation. Congress should refrain from infringing on the authority of the executive branch, and, to the maximum extent possible, should support the President in developing foreign policies to carry out and protect the worldwide interests of our Nation.

Mr. President, in conclusion, the compromise we are debating today has been reviewed by the world community. It has undoubtedly had a wholesome effect on the situation in Lebanon and was a major factor contributing to the present cease-fire between the various factions involved in the conflict.

This past Tuesday, September 27, the Lebanese Ambassador to the United States said in a meeting which I attended with several other Senators here on Capitol Hill, that undoubtedly a cease-fire would not have been attained if this compromise authorizing an additional 18 months of participation by the U.S. Marines in the multinational peacekeeping force had not been formulated. We should not underestimate the positive effect the compromise will continue to have on the situation in Lebanon. It is an essential step in the right direction toward resolving the serious problems that plague the country of Lebanon, and I hope that my colleagues go on record in favor of this resolution.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY PRESIDENT SIAKA STEVENS, PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF SIERRA LEONE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in a moment I will yield to the distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mrs. KASSEBAUM), who is the chairman of the Subcommittee on African Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, so that she may introduce a fellow parliamentarian, the President of Sierra Leone, who was accompanied into the Chamber by the Vice President of the United States.

I ask unanimous consent that, after the introduction of our guest, the Senate stand in recess for 1 minute so that we may greet the President of Sierra Leone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I now yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, it is a pleasure today to introduce to the Senate a fellow parliamentarian, the President of Sierra Leone, Mr. Siaka Stevens.

RECESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will stand in recess for 1 minute.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 11:12 a.m., recessed until 11:14 a.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mrs. KASSEBAUM).

The Senate continued with the consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159).

Mr. BUMPERS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the Byrd amendment for a variety of reasons, but the first one is that I consider a resolution committing us to whatever the President chooses to do over the next 18 months as not only unconscionable but also an abdication of this body's responsibilities. The second reason I oppose the committee resolution is because I cannot stand idly by and not raise my voice as loudly as I can about the President of the United States ignoring the law of the land.

Maybe as a lawyer I have a tendency to overplay that point, but I believe that during the debate in Congress in 1974 before passing the War Powers Act, every possible constitutional objection to it was raised and was accommodated. Here we are 9 years after that lengthy and comprehensive debate, in which Congress was effectively saying no more Vietnams, no more undeclared wars, and no more Presidential wars. This law defines and demarcates the difference between executive and the legislative responsibilities. The law is as clear as any law I have ever read, and I read the law for 18 years before I came to Congress.

I am not going to belabor the legal questions because my colleagues who have spoken before me have already very precisely and definitively set out what the law says and how the President chooses to ignore it.

Our Founding Fathers debated these questions over 200 years ago. I know that we have had all kinds of undeclared wars—Vietnam, Korea, Formosa, and Central America. But after Vietnam, Congress finally stiffened its spine and said, "No more."

Alexander Hamilton was perhaps the brightest of all, or at least the most vocal on this issue, when our Constitution was being written. And anyone who engages in this debate without going back to read a little of what Alexander Hamilton said, and why the Founding Fathers decided that the President should not be allowed to declare war, abdicates his responsibility.

Alexander Hamilton said the the Chief Executive who is only allowed to spend money must not be allowed "to unleash the dogs of war."

Our Founding Fathers and all of those who came before us had had enough of the King's adventurism. In this drafting they had used and they even debated the terminology "make war"—only Congress can "make" war—and they had a big debate about the word "make," and they finally changed it to "declare war."

Ever since then it has been axiomatic that the Congress, the people who are going to get this country in war, must be the same pople who raise the revenues to fight that war.

The President has done everything in the world to thwart not just the letter of the law but the intent of the law. Why should I go down to Arkansas on Law Day, which a lot of us do who are lawyers, to speak to groups and tell them that we are a nation of laws and not of men, and that we must all abide by the law, when daily they see Secretary Watt abiding only by those laws he likes and declaring those unconstitutional that he does not like. And here you have the President being both judge and jury over the question of the consitutionality of the War Powers Act, which was as thoroughly debated by constitutional scholars in this country as any law has ever been debated.

He wants to accommodate so some of the Members on this side of the aisle will not take strong exceptions to his policies. Here on August 30, 1983, is a letter addressed to the President of the Senate, Senator THURMOND, in which he says:

> We have periodically provided Congress with updated information on the activities of these forces and on the circumstances of their deployment in Lebanon.

I missed all those meetings. I was not kept abreast. This letter says that they provided Congress with updated information periodically, but I missed it.

And the letter goes on to say:

> In light of recent events I am providing this further report on the deployment in accordance with my desire that Congress continue to be informed on this matter and consistent with section 4 of the War Powers Resolution.

This is not consistent with section 4 of the War Powers Resolution. No one here should hang his hat on this letter or be deluded into believing that this letter even comes close to complying with a mandate of section 4 of the War Powers Act, becuase it does not. This is nothing in the world but a diversionary tactic.

The War Powers Act says the President will report to us within 48 hours of introducing American troops into hostile situations or situations that imminently could be hostile. He is to report to us why he is using troops within 48 hours and unless Congress acts within 60 days he has to withdraw. It is clear as the nose on every face in this body.

This is not a compliance with War Powers Act, and the President admits it is not. He has said, and so has Secretary Shultz, that this is not in compliance with the War Powers Act.

There is nothing in here about why we are there and how long we expect to stay, our mission, our role, nothing.

We have not even been able to get the President to admit that our troops are in a hostile situation. But he sends the majority leader a letter and says:

> I want to assure you that there will be no "substantial expansion" of our role in Lebanon without congressional approval.

(Mrs. KASSEBAUM assumed the chair.)

Mr. NUNN. Madam President, will the Senator yield for just one brief observation?

Mr. BUMPERS. I yield.

Mr. NUNN. If the Senator would look at the resolution in the committee report—this is the Percy-Baker resolution—there is a statement of the goal and mission as seen by Congress of the marines in Lebanon. It is a statement that is so broad it goes beyond even what the administration has said. They have been very hard to pin down. As we have all said many times during this debate, we cannot get the administration to tell us what the mission of the marines is. They tell us the diplomatic goals in that area, and of the diplomatic goals, one of the main goals, of course, is to remove all foreign forces from Lebanon.

Another diplomatic goal is to help assure the sovereignty of the Lebanese Government over all its territory, which had not happened during the history of Lebanon to my knowledge.

Now what Congress has done, if we pass this Baker-Percy resolution, and if the Byrd resolution fails, is we have given a mission to the U.S. Marines in Lebanon. It is very clear here. We have said that the mission of the marines implicitly—I underscore the word implicitly because this is set forth in paragraph 1—is the removing of all foreign forces from Lebanon. That is a foreign policy objective, implicitly a goal also for our military forces but explicitly, and I think this is enormously important and I really do not believe our colleagues have focused on this. If we pass this resolution, the Percy-Baker resolution, we are explicitly saying and I quote:

In order to restore full control by the government of Lebanon over its own territory, the United States is currently participating in the multinational peacekeeping force.

That becomes the goal. That is a worthy diplomatic goal. But it is an absolutely absurd military mission, absolutely absurd to believe that 1,200 or 1,400 U.S. marines plus their counterparts from three other countries could undertake to achieve a military mission of removing or of having full sovereignty of the Lebanese Government over all its territory when 40,000 or 50,000 Israeli forces were unable to help fulfill that goal.

That is what we are endorsing here today. This is in many respects a much broader delegation of authority in the President than anyone has ever envisioned. What we are really doing, as I see it, is we are setting up an unlimited mission that is virtually open ended, with unlimited goals with very, very limited military power.

That is the absolute reverse of what Congress ought to be doing under the War Powers Act. We should be trying to get the mission defined and if we agree with that mission, we should be giving the President of the United States the authority to use the military power necessary to accomplish it. So we are doing precisely the opposite and if Congress passes this Baker-Percy resolution, we are in my view setting up an extremely broad delegation of authority with a very limited military force.

It seems to me that we are reversing the real role that was envisioned by those who passed the War Powers Act, and it also seems to me that we are setting the stage as a nation by diplomatic errors and political mistakes. We are setting the stage or the scene for another perceived American military failure. To those who are concerned about what happened after Vietnam with military morale. I say they should think very, very seriously about what we are doing here today.

We are saying to those 1,400 marines in Lebanon, sitting there under all those guns from every direction, where they really do not even know who is firing and when they are fired on from populated areas, "Fellows, your mission now is to stay there until"—quoting again—"full control is assumed by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory."

That is their mission, and if I were the head of the Marine Corps on the Joint Chiefs, certainly if I were commanding those forces, I would say, "Mr. President, Members of Congress, if that is our mission, you better give us some more power, you better give us a lot more power; we better have the Army help, the Navy help, and the Air Force help because we are sitting here surrounded on three sides in an absolutely impossible military position. If this is our mission as expressed in this resolution the Senate is voting on today, then, Mr. President, Members of Congress, back us up. Give us everything we need to accomplish it." Those are the military implications of this.

I saw where Congressman SAM GIBBONS said yesterday, and I think he put his finger on it when he said what we have is a situation where we do not have enough marines there to fight but we have too many to die.

I think that is precisely the kind of military position we are put in. I hope, for the sake of our military, that the American people realize from the outset, as we are going into this, that this is not a militarily sound proposition.

The military is being put in this situation by political decisions, by diplomatic decisions; and if we pass this resolution as sponsored by Senator BAKER and Senator PERCY, Congress is fully participating and, if anything, expanding the mission.

I do not think there has been very much focus on what the breadth of this kind of proposition is that we are talking about today. It is clear. The administration has not been clear on its definition of mission, but this resolution is clear.

Mr. SARBANES. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUMPERS. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. Madam President, I want to follow along the line of thought of the distinguished Senator from Georgia.

He is absolutely correct to point to the findings and purpose contained in this resolution and the breadth of that mission.

However, to give us even more pause, there was a report of an interview that Secretary Shultz had over Cable News Network last weekend. I want to quote briefly from that newspaper account:

Secretary of State George P. Shultz said yesterday that the mission of the U.S. marines and other Western forces should continue in Lebanon until there is stability in that country, which he indicated should include the withdrawal of Israeli, Syrian and Palestine Liberation Organization forces.

Given the chaotic situation in Lebanon, a senior administration official acknowledged, this could mean an indefinite commitment to remain there because "nobody knows if the Syrians will every agree to pull out."

Later in the same article, it says:

Mr. Shultz also said that even if the foreign forces are withdrawn eventually, he could foresee the multinational force's being given another mission. Instead of being stationed in the Beirut area, "we've always had it in mind that if withdrawal of all foreign forces could be brought about and the Lebanese armed forces, which we've been helping train, can move in and take charge in those areas, that the multinational force, not just our marines, might occupy some strategic positions in Lebanon."

A senior official said that there has been planning for the Western forces to be stationed in such key areas as the Beirut-Damascus highway to ensure that Syrian or PLO forces do not reenter Lebanon.

As the Senator has pointed out, this resolution is a tremendously broad definition of the mission, and you have the Secretary of State, in this news account and in other comments which Members have heard, indicating that they envision a greatly broadened mission.

The Senator is absolutely right: You cannot square the breadth of the mission that is being talked about here, both in the resolution and by the Secretary of State, with the resources, the military resources, that have been committed at present into that area. In other words, to achieve this mission we are talking about, the broad one, they clearly will have to involve a much greater infusion of military resources.

Mr. NUNN. The Senator is correct.

What we have here is the worst of all worlds. We have Congress saying, if we pass the Baker resolution: "Hold what you have over there. We do not want you to put any more military forces in. Tell us if you are going to put any in. Get notice from us. Let us know. We want to debate that before you do it. We are going to give you 18 months. But here is the mission we are going to give you to restore the sovereignty of the Lebanese Government over all its territory." That is something that has not happened in history.

Then, in addition, we are saying implicity—I want to underscore that, because it is not directly—that we are going to participate in the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon—again, a worthy diplomatic goal that is totally unachievable without tremendous military forces.

We have the last two administrations saying that we are already stretched thin all over the world. What commitments are we going to be diluting? We are going to keep our commitment in NATO, I assume. We are going to keep our commitment in Northeast Asia, Korea, and the Persian Gulf—and we read every day about problems there. We are adding another area by definition. We are implicitly saying that Lebanon is now in our vital interests, and we are going to do whatever is necessary.

Mr. SARBANES. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the article from which I quoted.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Sept. 25, 1983]

SHULTZ TIES WITHDRAWAL TO LEBANON'S STABILITY

WASHINGTON.—Secretary of State George P. Shultz said yesterday that the mission of the U.S. marines and other Western forces should continue in Lebanon until there is stability in that country, which he indicated should include the withdrawal of Israeli, Syrian and Palestine Liberation Organization forces.

Given the chaotic situation in Lebanon, a senior administration official acknowledged, this could mean an indefinite commitment to remain there because "nobody knows if the Syrians will every agree to pull out."

Mr. Shultz's comments, which came in an interview over the Cable News Network, were likely to cause further concern in Congress because, as he did when he testified last Wednesday before two congressional committees, the secretary refused to guarantee that the marines now in Lebanon would be pulled out in 18 months or that the size of the contingent or the scope of its mission would be expanded.

A resolution pending before Congress that President Reagan has agreed to sign is meant by its congressional sponsors to put definite limits on the role of the marines under the authority of the 1973 War Powers Act.

When asked if he would guarantee that the size of the force would not be enlarged, Mr. Shultz said yesterday that although there was no plan for an increase, he would not provide a "guarantee, which is a flat, unequivocal, never-say-never type of things."

He said in defending his refusal to give a pledge of no change that "you can't foresee what the situation may be."

"And I don't want to be in the position of acting as though I know exactly what the situation will be," he said.

At one point in the interview, the secretary refused to provide details on the conditions for pulling out the approximately 5,500 American, British, French, and Italian members of the multinational force. But under questioning, he added:

"We have to judge the situation, and we want to have the marines continue their mission, and the other multinational force elements continue their mission, in supporting the emergence of stability in Lebanon. If we can find a situation in Lebanon that has stability in it, in terms of the structure of the government and removal of foreign forces, that's the objective."

When asked if that meant it would not be possible to achieve "stability" without the removal of the foreign forces, he agreed, saying: "I think that if you have a country with, say, 75 percent or so occupied by foreign forces, it's hard to see how the government of that country has control of it, and has stability."

Mr. Shultz also said that even if the foreign forces are withdrawn eventually, he could foresee the multinational force's being given another mission. Instead of being stationed in the Beirut area, "we've always had it in mind that if withdrawal of all foreign forces could be brought about and the Lebanese armed forces, which we've been helping train, can move in and take charge in those areas, that the multinational force, not just our marines, might occupy some strategic positions in Lebanon."

A senior official said that there has been planning for the Western forces to be stationed in such key areas as the Beirut-Damascus highway to ensure that Syrian or PLO forces do not reenter Lebanon. They also might be sent to port areas and other regions to serve as a political support to the Lebanese.

U.S. officials said yesterday they were not certain how many foreign troops are in Lebanon. But one official estimated there are about 15,000 Israelis in southern Lebanon, about 40,000 Syrians in eastern and northern Lebanon and 11,000 to 15,000 Palestinian forces, some of them attached to the Syrian army and others on their own. There also are small numbers of Iranians and Libyans in support of the anti-government forces in Lebanon.

Senator Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R.Md.), when told of Mr. Shultz's comments yesterday, said that he felt the administration was being "ungenerous" and "unresponsive," given the desire of Congress to be cooperative. But he said that although the administration does not want "to waive any of its rights," he believed that once the resolution limiting the time, scope and size of the U.S. involvement in Lebanon was passed and signed, the administration probably would be "willing to live with it."

Mr. SPECTER. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NUNN. I have to say, in deference to my friend from Pennsylvania, that I do not have the floor.

Mr. SPECTER. I think we might use some time from this side as well.

Mr. BUMPERS. I yield.

Mr. SPECTER. Madam President, the Senator and I share concerns as expressed about the mission.

The question I pose to the distinguished Senator from Georgia, in searching for a definition of mission which is achievable with the size force that is present is this: I refer to the President's letter of September 29, 1982, to the President pro tempore of the Senate, in which the mission is defined as follows:

Their mission is to provide an interposition force at agreed locations and thereby provide the multinational presence requested by the Lebanese Government to assist it and the Lebanese Armed Forces.

Is this the mission?

The concern I have expressed in earlier debate on this subject is the problem of having the declaration of war by implication or by having Congress, through this war powers resolution, delegate the power to wage war.

In a colloquy with Senator PERCY on Tuesday, Senator PERCY agreed that what had been going on in Lebanon amounted to a war.

The concern which I expressed was that the war powers resolution might constitute a congressional declaration of war by implication or delegation to the President of the authority to declare war, which I think would be unconstitutional.

In further discussions with the executive branch, I have sought to find what their intentions are, and I expect to engage in a colloquy with Senator PERCY on this subject when he arrives on the floor. But it goes to the same issue which is being debated at this moment and is the reason I rise now to ask this question:

If the mission is limited to being only an interposition force, and that is all the 1,200 or 1,400 marines are to be and if the 2,000 marines offshore are not designed to do anything except prevent another Dunkirk, and if the air support is to do nothing except defend the 1,400 marines, and the naval power is to do nothing but defend 1,400 marines, then it may be that a narrow definition has indeed been arrived at with the agreement of the Executive that does not involve the Senate and then Congress delegating to the President the authority to declare war.

In looking at the word "interpostion," which is a very novel kind of word that is very seldom used, and referring to Webster's Dictionary "interposition" is defined as "to interpose." "Interpose" is defined, in turn, as "to place in an intervening position; to step in between parties at variance; stepping in to settle a quarrel or conflict."

If "mission" is defined in terms of "interposition" and the 1,400 marines are limited to "stepping in between opposing forces," and none of our other forces there—the 2,000 marines offshore or the air forces or the ships—are to have any role beyond self-defense, then is that kind of mission sufficiently limited to only be a "stepping in between parties at variance," and not to become involved in the fight of the parties at variance, but only to become involved in fighting to the extent of self-defense? Is that the kind of mission which is sufficiently limited so that 1,400 marines can, in fact, carry it out?

Mr. NUNN. Madam President, I say to the Senator that I think he asked a good question. He poses a much, much more limited mission than has been posed by the administration in their testimony—the Senator is referring to a letter. But I think the Senator should realize that that kind of word and that kind of description of a mission is not described in this resolution that is called the Baker-Percy resolution. This resolution says that the mission is to restore the full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory.

So what the Senator has described is a very limited, much more limited, mission, but what we have here is a very broad mission.

I would say that is what, in my view, the Congress ought to be doing. I think what we ought to be doing, under our war powers authority, is to pin the administration down, for the benefit of Congress and the American people, as to what the mission is and as to when the mission would be completed, not in terms of time but in terms of events. When would we be able to say the marines had fulfilled their mission? Now, if somebody cannot answer that question, it seems to me what Congress is doing here, we are saying we have the authority under the War Powers Act to participate in this decision but if we pass this resolution with this kind of broad authority, not ever pinning down the administration on what they are talking about, we are pretty convincingly demonstrating we do not know what to do with the War Powers Act.

Madam President, I think the dialog with the Senator from Pennsylvania is helpful, because there is no doubt, when the original MNF was sent over to Lebanon, the definition in that exchange was much, much more limited. That definition has expanded tremendously, and we have the ultimate expansion of it before us today in the form of the Baker-Percy resolution.

I would say that if this body is serious about the mission of our forces being to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory, if that is what we mean, instead of having amendments that are going to cut the time down, which we are going to have later in the day, from 18 months to 6 months, we better have an amendment that is going to give them 5 years or 10 years and we had better have an amendment that is going to give the administration the full power to use all military force necessasry to accomplish this mission.

The worst of all worlds is a congressional resolution that sets up a mission that is unlimited in scope, unlimited in duration, and yet restricts the hand of the Commander in Chief in terms of the time and in terms of the force that can be employed.

We talk about Vietnam—and I doubt there is an analogy directly in terms of Vietnam, as far as the position of our forces. It was much more dangerous in many respects. I do not think there is an analogy in any part of the world with Vietnam.

But, from the point of an analogy, what we did in Vietnam, we went in without knowing what we were going into, without having a clear mission, except expanding, expanding, expanding, and we never did give the kind of forces required to carry out that mission.

This is the most clear example, in advance of a disaster, I have seen of a repetition of that kind of mistake.

Mr. BUMPERS. Madam President, the Senator makes one of the most cogent points I have heard made. First of all, he has honed in on precisely what this debate is all about, and that is Congress passing a resolution saying what our foreign policy is, the President saying, "I don't like it, but I will accept it," and then the Secretary of State coming before the Foreign Relations Committee and saying, "Now, there is a difference between consult and authorize. We are saying that, if we broaden our role,"—which everybody knows, if this thing is worth the paper it is written on, we must do—"we will consult with Congress."

But he made a very clear distinction that this did not mean the administration was going to ask for authority to broaden their role. And the President had ratified that in his letter to the majority leader when he said, "We won't extend our forces there without consulting with Congress." Secretary Shultz went on to say: "The reason we will only consult with you is we are not about to abdicate our constitutional authority to do what we are doing." But then he closed out—and this was the most cynical of all—"Of course, we will be coming to Congress for the funds to wage this war."

Well, that is exactly what Hamilton said 200 years ago. The reason the Founding Fathers were not going to give the Chief Executive the power to declare war was because they know that the people have to support our military adventures and they are the ones who have to pay for it. We, in Congress, are their elected Representatives. We are the ones who have to raise the revenues for war. That is the reason they wanted us to be responsible to the American people so that we did not foster any unpopular, unwarranted wars on the American people.

Yet, the Secretary of State, no less, says, "We will consult with you and, of course, we will be coming to you to ask you to raise funds for this little adventure."

Well, I apologize for getting so loud. I do, indeed, get exercised. But the Senator from Georgia has eloquently stated, better than I ever could, precisely what we are getting ready to bog ourselves down in.

I might vote—if I really believe that our national security interest was directly on the line and it really involved our future security—I might vote for a resolution that gave the President even 10 years to implement all of these policies. But you tell me what is involved here, when the Secretary of State says we are going to stay until all foreign forces are withdrawn. This resolution says: "The removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential U.S. foreign policy objective in the Middle East."

Well, what if Syria decides to say: "We are not ever leaving"? Does that mean "We are not ever leaving," too? How can you reach any other conclusion if you vote for this resolution?

The distinguished Senator from New York, Senator MOYNIHAN, has pointed out time and time again on this floor what Walter Lippman said years ago: "Don't try to implement a foreign policy that you don't have the military strength to implement." Those who do not understand history are doomed to repeat the failures of the past.

That is precisely what we are about to do.

I cannot even name all the players in Lebanon. I ask the people in this body. If we were going to declare war tomorrow, who would you declare it on? There are so many players we do not know their names. We do not know what separates their religions, what separates the Druze from the Shiites. Are the Maronites and the Phalanges all the same?

When you consider all the parties there, I invite you to tell this body the kind of government that you envision stabilizing Lebanon.

You tell me. The Constitution adopted in 1943 for Lebanon, literally dictated by the French, says the Christians shall have a majority of the Members of Parliament in Lebanon. And they were using a 1932 census that was already 11 years old to prove that the Christians were in a majority in Lebanon, to write that into the Constitution. Today, everybody knows that the Moslems are a sizable majority in Lebanon. Are the Christians ready to repeal that portion of the Constitution of Lebanon? I have not seen any sign of it.

So I invite you to tell me what kind of a coalition and what numbers will make up the next Lebanese Government that can bring all of those diverse religious, political, socioeconomic factors together and stabilize that poor, bedraggled nation. If you believe somebody can do it and can do it within 18 months, vote for the resolution. But I will remind you, do not vote for the resolution in reliance on the existence of a cease-fire that has been holding for 48 hours, because that is the 179th cease-fire since 1975.

Madam President, if we are going to stay there until all forces are withdrawn, then that is a lot longer than 18 months. If we are going to stay until there is a free, independent Lebanon, which is what you are voting for, then let the President come and tell us how many troops it is going to take to guarantee that. Are we going to stay regardless of whether the British, French, and Italians stay? Are they going to stay regardless of whether we do? Are we going to prop up an unpopular government, as we did in Vietnam?

Those are questions that only the President can answer, and he has a legal as well as a moral duty to the people of this country to say what the situation is.

Madam President, I was opposed to our marines going there. Senator GOLDWATER, Senator JACKSON, and several Senators came here and said:

> We are getting ready to bog ourselves down into a situation from which we will not easily extricate ourselves and some Marines will surely die. The focus of hostilities is just as great on the American people and the U.S. Marines there as it is on Israel because they perceive us as being one and the same.

The down side of Vietnam was that the American people, for the first time, had developed a cynical attitude about a lying Government.

I have heard Senators in the cloak room despair that when they go home on weekends, people quite often ask them, "Are we getting the full story on this Korean airliner?"

Let me say for the benefit of all my constituents, I believe they are getting the full story. I believe the President and the Secretary of State have been absolutely truthful to the American people on everything we can tell them about the Korean airliner. But do not despair or dismay about the cynicism of the American people, when they were consistently lied to about whether we were bombing Cambodia, consistently lied to about whether we were bombing Laos, and consistently lied to during the whole Watergate episode from the President on down through Cabinet members in the highest echelons of Government. Why would they not be cynical now about whether they were getting the whole truth?

It is a price this country will pay and pay and pay again for decades to come.

That was the down side.

The up side is, the American people were literally demanding that the War Powers Act be passed to make sure the President did not just whimsically, capriciously, and arbitrarily involve our sons in foreign wars that had no popular support. Every person in this body, I promise you, has already seen the Washington Post poll reported in this morning's Washington Post. If you have not, go get it and look at it before you vote on this resolution.

People are saying, "If you can convince us that our national security is on the line, send our troops, send my sons." I have two. I cannot even talk about it without getting emotional because they are my life.

I am telling you, the people of this country do not want another 55,000 dead young sons over something they do not understand and they are saying in the Washington Post poll this morning, "We do not want it."

Well, that is the up side of Vietnam.

As the Senator from Gerogia said, the parallel is not perfect. I would not suggest for a moment that it is. But there are enough lessons to be learned from Vietnam that we ought not to do what we are about to do.

Let me just close by saying there are about 1,100 marines on shore and another 2,000 on ships and a lot of Navy people there. You see, I am happy, because I am one of those fathers who has two sons—one already practicing law, one in law school—and a daughter in college. They are happy and stable and they are not in Lebanon. But I am telling you, every parent in this body who understands the greatest love of all ought not to vote on this resolution without assuming that he does have a son there.

Madam President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I do not know how many other Senators wish to speak, but we do have a statutory deadline. I am advised that there are amendments other than this amendment to deal with. Therefore, unless some other Senator is prepared to speak, I am prepared to make a motion to table.

Mr. TSONGAS. Those of us who do have amendments would like to have the chance to have those amendments voted upon. We have 2½ hours remaining. We think these amendments are important and should be voted upon.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I see no other Senator wishing to speak on this amendment. I now move to table the Byrd amendment and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

VOTE ON MOTION TO TABLE AMENDMENT NO. 2231, AS MODIFIED

The question is on agreeing to the motion to table the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 45—as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I voted against the Byrd amendment not because I want our troops to stay in Lebanon longer than 2 months, but rather because I want to see them come home sooner.

As I said in a statement yesterday on the Senate floor, I believe our marines are serving no useful military purpose in Beirut and the President should withdraw them as soon as prudently possible.

I believe it is the responsibility of Congress to set the policy in this matter, but it is the responsibility of the President to carry it out. It would not be wise for Congress to, in effect, legitimize a 2-month stay by voting for thr Byrd amendment. Rather, I hope that the Senate will put the President on notice that the use of ground forces in Lebanon is not a viable one and it is the Senate's feeling that those troops should be removed, leaving to the President the time and method of removal.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if we could have order for a moment, I have an announcement I wish to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I suggest Members take their seats.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senators will please take their seats. The Senate will be in order.

The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, it has been brought to my attention that all or virtually all of the time of those in opposition to the resolution has expired.

There is about 2 hours remaining before the statutory time for the vote.

I suggest that, as there are other amendments, we try to arrange time limitations and time certain to vote, notwithstanding the time has expired on that side. I am sure the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee would be glad to accommodate to that requirement.

I also have a request for a 5-minute colloquy, may I say to the minority leader, between the assistant minority leader and the Senator from Missouri. We are willing to yield time for that purpose.

Could I inquire, first, if we could arrive on a time agreement on the next amendment which I understand to be the Pell amendment.

Mr. PELL. That is correct.

I will be glad to accept a 20-minute time limitation, 10 minutes equally divided.

Mr. BAKER. Could I inquire of the minority leader if that is suitable on his side?

Mr BYRD. I should think an amendment of that importance should have at least 30 minutes equally divided.

Mr. PELL. I am trying to be fair with everyone because there are a lot of other amendments.

Mr BYRD. I will not stand in the Senator's way.

Mr. BAKER. Very well.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on the Pell amendment there be a time limitation of 20 minutes equally divided and at the end of that time or time yielded back the vote occur on or in relation to that amendment.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEICKER). The Senator from Massachusetts reserves the right to object.

Mr. TSONGAS. Will the leader indicate what the procedure will be subsequent to the Pell amendment?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. President, what I propose to do, assuming that the chairman of the committee is agreeable, and I feel he will be, what I propose to do is make other arrangements between now and 2 p.m. for other amendments in a similar way.

Mr. TSONGAS. I only wish to indicate I have two. I do not need any time to debate. I wish to have them voted on. They will need some debate but not extended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I only reserve to ask is the Pell amendment cutting from 18 months to 6 months?

Mr. PELL. The Senator is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, now for the information of the Senate, I have been given this piece of paper, and that purports to say that there is a Pell amendment to be disposed of, a Levin amendment to be disposed of, an Eagleton amendment to be disposed of, and two Tsongas amendments, as well as a colloquy between Senators EAGLETON and CRANSTON.

Mr. President, may I say I wish to reserve 10 minutes on this side for a closing statement before the final vote. I am sure the minority leader will wish to do the same.

So I suggest that as this debate and vote is in progress on the Pell amendment, we try to arrange the remainder of the time on this measure.

AMENDMENT NO. 2228

(Purpose: To shorten the authorized period of participation of U.S. Armed Forces in the multinational force in Lebanon from eighteen months to six months)

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I call up amendment No. 2228 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), for himself and Mr. DIXON, proposes an amendment numbered 2228.

On page 7, line 9, strike out the word "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, this amendment, which is cosponsored by Senator DIXON, is a very simple amendment indeed. It removes or reduces the 18 months in the Baker-Percy resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the Senate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. There are several votes scheduled. There will be no time for debate unless the Senate gets into order immediately.

This is the first and last time the Chair cares to make a comment.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania notes that on this last vote, which was a straight party line vote, 55 Republicans voted in the affirmative. The Senator from Pennsylvania would appreciate a ruling of the Chair if that is not the first time 55 Republicans have been in the Senate in a half a century all voting together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. I thank the Chair.

This is a very simple amendment indeed. It accepts the Baker-Percy resolution but reduces the time from 18 to 6 months.

I know, speaking as one Senator on this side, if that 6 months is accepted I would support the Baker-Percy resolution. If it is not, I really could not do so.

In making this point and in introducing this resolution, I cannot help but remember the talk——

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, if I may make a point of order, this is certainly an important matter. The Senator is taking an important position. We cannot hear him, and we cannot even see each other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator makes a point of order. The Senate is not in order. The Senator is correct. The debate will not resume until the Senate comes to order.

Senators take their seats or carry on their conversations in the cloakroom. The Chair requests that Senators converse in the cloakroom or take their seats.

Mr. PELL. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, we are all products of our times. I think that those of us who were here at the time of Vietnam and at the time of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution have certain memories and certain worries and certain fears.

As I read the text of this resolution, it says that it shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to insure the safety of the multinational force in Lebanon.

Then, I read a parallel phrase from the Gulf of Tonkin resolution: "To take all necessary measures to repeal any armed attack against the forces of the United States, to prevent further aggression."

While the words may be dissimilar, the objectives and the purposes are very similar.

I would be worried that what we are passing here is an 18-month Gulf of Tonkin resolution. I admit that a 6-month Gulf of Tonkin resolution is not a good idea, either, but I think it is better than an 18-month one.

I also add the Foreign Relations Committee, by its initial vote of 9 to 8, accepted the reduction to 8 months; and it was only after some further discussion, reconsideration, and persuasion that the committee reversed itself and voted the other by 9 to 8.

It seems to me that with such a close vote within the committee, which had studied the matter carefully, it would indicate the sentiment of all of us, particularly the initial vote.

That sentiment is bolstered by the poll in today's Washington Post which showed 29 percent of the American people in favor of 18 months or more, 58 percent in favor of 6 months or less.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the Washington Post-ABC news poll.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. MAJORITY FAVORS LIMITING DEPLOYMENT TO 6 MONTHS OR LESS

(By Barry Sussman)

Demonstrating growing concern over the possibility of war, a majority of Americans say they want Congress to limit the continued deployment of U.S. Marines in Lebanon to six months or less, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Only 29 percent of those questioned nationwide last weekend were willing for President Reagan to keep the Marines in Lebanon for another 18 months, as authorized in the compromise resolution approved by the House yesterday, while 58 percent said the Marines should be brought home in six months or sooner.

Forty-three percent said they think the United States will become so involved in the conflict in Lebanon that this country will go to war there, but 46 percent say they think the United States will stay out of war.

The poll showed that overall anxiety about the possibility of war has increased dramatically in the weeks since four Marines were killed in Lebanon and since a Soviet pilot shot down a South Korean airliner, killing 269 people.

One in four Americans listed the threat of war as the nation's No. 1 problem. A total of 34 percent saw war, the Soviet Union, communism and international affairs generally as the nation's worst problem.

That is more than three times the magnitude of such concern since The Washington Post-ABC News survey began in February, 1981. It places fear of war on a level with economic problems as the greatest concern of the American public. Six of every 10 Americans cited the Middle East as the worst trouble spot in the world, the one most likely to drag the United States into war with the Soviet Union. By comparison, only 1 in 10 cited Central America or Europe as posing a similar threat.

Asked whether they feel that what happens in Lebanon is important enough to risk going to war, 21 percent said yes, while far fewer expressed a willingness to risk war in Central America. However, 67 percent said Lebanon is not important enough to risk war.

The poll showed Americans sharply divided over what role U.S. forces should play in Lebanon.

Thirty percent said U.S. warships and planes off the coast of Lebanon should be used to help the Lebanese government fight those trying to overthrow it, including Syria and the Palestine Liberation Organization. Thirty-six percent said the ships and planes should be used only to defend the U.S. Marines in the multinational force in Lebanon. And 31 percent rejected both those alternatives, saying that all American forces should be withdrawn from Lebanon.

The poll was conducted last Thursday through Monday, before and after a cease-fire was agreed on by the opposing forces in Lebanon over the weekend. Those interviewed after the cease-fire was announced showed hardly any change in views from those interviewed earlier.

The public's heightened concern is reflected in other poll findings as well. Reagan continued to be viewed negatively for his handling of foreign affairs overall, and, for the first time, he was rated negatively for his dealings with the Soviet Union.

Forty-nine percent of those polled said they disapprove Reagan's handling of relations with the Soviet Union, 44 percent said they approve, and 7 percent expressed no opinion. Forty-nine percent also said Reagan's manner of dealing with the Soviet Union is increasing the chances of war. Only 34 percent expressed that sentiment as recently as August.

Until now, Post-ABC polls have shown that a plurality or majority believed Reagan's way of dealing with the Soviet Union decreased chances of war or, at the least, made no difference. In the new poll, however, only 33 percent said they believed this.

Ironically, one result of the shifting mood is increased support for Reagan's emphasis on building up the military. In three earlier surveys this year, a majority said Reagan was "going too far" in his plans to increase military spending. Less than a majority said they feel that way now.

Fifty-one percent also said they now support development of the MX missile, a change from earlier this year, and more people said the United States "should spend whatever is necessary to achieve military superiority over the Soviet Union."

Most people still said they want spending kept to a level producing equality in strength between the superpowers. But 32 percent said the United States should spend enough to achieve superiority, compared with 22 percent in August.

Reagan also scored much higher in responses to the question: "Who do you think has better goals for increasing military spending: Reagan or the Democratic leaders in Congress?"

At the end of July and the beginning of August, when the Post and ABC News first asked that question, the response was: 45 percent for Reagan and 40 percent for Democratic leaders, with 15 percent unable to choose. In the new survey, 50 percent favored Reagan's goals, 35 percent favored the Democrats', and 15 percent offered no opinion. According to the poll, Americans are sharply critical of Reagan's conduct of foreign affairs but they appear to be drifting toward his policies, rather than toward those of his leading opponents.

At the same time, there is virtually no change on one key issue: overwhelming public support for a freeze on nulear weapons by both the United States and the Soviet Union. If anything, support for a freeze may be stronger than it has been.

When first asked if they approved of the freeze, 80 percent said yes. The Post-ABC News interviewers then listed arguments for and against the freeze to encourage more measured responses and asked once more whether people approved or disapproved of the freeze. In that second response, 77 percent said they approve.

Using the same procedure in April, 1982, the Post and ABC News found 76 percent supporting the freeze in response to the initial question about it, and 71 percent approving if after hearing the arguments on both sides.

The increase in those citing the possibility of war as the nation's No. 1 problem did not appear to be accompanied by a lessening of concern about the nation's economy. Instead, the poll indicated that optimism about the direction of the economy has leveled off.

Only 44 percent said they thought the economy is improving, compared with 50 percent who felt that way at the beginning of August. Only 15 percent thought the recession has ended. And Reagan is given slightly lower marks now than he was in August for his handling of the economy.

Note: Figures are from a Washington Post ABC News telephone poll of 1,506 people nationwide from Sept. 22 to 26.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, this indicates that almost twice as many of the American people are for 6 months or less, rather than 18 months or more.

Finally, we would go with marine troops, as Secretary Shultz has said, "to find a situation in Lebanon that has stability in it."

Well, except for the brief period between World Wars I and II, there really has not been stability in the land called Lebanon since the time of the Crusades, when the Christians settled there in the midst of Muslim territory; and I do not see any short-term solution to the problem.

For all these reasons, I hope my colleagues will vote to shorten the 18 months to 6 months.

Mr. TOWER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I do not know who is in control of time on this side. I should like to be recognized on the time in opposition to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, several years ago, in the case of United States against Curtis Wright Export Corporation, Justice Sutherland wrote a very classic opinion that I think bears repeating here—at least in part. He said:

> Not only, as we have shown, is the federal power over external affairs in origin and essential character different from that over internal affairs, but participation in the exercise of the power is significantly limited. In this vast external realm, with its important, complicated, delicate and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the nation. He makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates. Into the field of negotiation the Senate cannot intrude; and Congress itself is powerless to invade it. As Marshall said in his great argument of March 7, 1800, in the House of Representatives, "The President is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations.' Annals, 6th Cong., col. 613. * * * It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction were domestic affairs alone involved.

Mr. President, in my view, the Founding Fathers did not intend that Congress should intervene this actively in the conduct of foreign policy. The American military is an instrument of foreign policy, and one of its functions is to support the foreign policy objectives of the United States. In this connection, the President must have as much flexibility as possible.

We are not capable of formulating and implementing foreign policy in this body, and we are proving it in this very debate. With the numbers of different approaches and views on the whole matter of our involvement in the peacemaking process in the Middle East, we are clearly demonstrating our incompetence in the field of foreign policy. I hate to say it. But I believe that the Congress of the United States is appallingly unsophisticated in foreign policy matters.

Too often, we make judgments on such matters based on domestic political considerations, and that becomes evident when my distinguished friend from Rhode Island introduced into the RECORD a poll taken by the Washington Post to see what the popular whim of the moment is. If foreign policy is going to be conducted on the basis of the popular whim of the moment, the United States will be totally unable to maintain a credible and sustained foreign policy.

What question did the pollster ask? Simply, "Do you favor getting the marines out of Lebanon?" That is all. No explanation to the respondent about why they are there, about their significance to the peacekeeping process.

I wonder how they would have responded if the question was: "Do you think the United States should make every effort to preserve peace in the Middle East and to stabilize that unstable area of this world, particularly where American interests are vitally involved?" And, knowing of our great concern for the preservation of the territorial and political integrity of Israel, the national interests of Israel are also involved here.

Mr. President, if we fool around with this resolution, start putting in conditions, timetables, we run the very grave risk of making the United States irrelevant to the peacemaking process in the Middle East.

If we put a time limit of less than 18 months on this resolution, what we are doing is inviting hostile elements, who are uncomfortable with our presence there, to kill American marines. It is such an invitation. Any military man will tell you that. Anybody with any experience in such matters will tell you that. If we get to the point where you force the President to withdraw from Lebanon through congressional action, then I do not think we can be a credible part of any multinational force again.

A year ago, the marines went into Lebanon. Some voices were raised, questioning whether it was a wise idea; but there was no action by Congress, not even any considerable debate over the matter in Congress, and we knew what the risks were, and we were virtually silent.

If we now enter into an arrangement of this kind, as we are, with the multinational force and cut and run when the shots are fired, then we actually reduce to impotence the value of American military power as an essential element in the pursuit of our foreign policy objectives.

It is that serious. We better not be looking at polls in the Washington Post. We better not be listening to rhetoric. We better be considering the long-range implications of what we do.

You place a 6-month time limit in this resolution and you put the lives of American marines in jeopardy. We had better understand that.

Now, in my view, the War Powers Act is one of the worst pieces of mischief that the Congress of the United States has ever promulgated. I do not believe that it is constitutional. It has not been subjected to a test of the courts. I think we were unwise in the first place to pass it. I was 1 of the 18 who voted against it. And I might note that I think there are only about 30 of us here now in the Senate that were here when that act was passed. We were simply institutionalizing our disenchantment with the Vietnam war. That is what we were doing. We must consider the passions of the moment that prompted the passage of this act in the first place.

But I can cite time after time after time—and I will not go through that litany right now because of limited time—in the time I have been in the Senate, almost 23 years, that congressional intervention into the foreign policy implementation process has resulted in disaster. We had better consider carefully what we do. We better consider the long-term implications. We better consider the impact on the future influence of the United States of America in world affairs as we act on this matter.

I hope that the amendment that would limit by resolution our participation to 6 months will be roundly defeated. It is, in my view, an invitation of those who want us out to put the pressure on as the 6-month period moves toward expiration. It will result in the loss of American lives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I also would like to join my colleague from Texas. I underscore his remarks. I agree with his remarks.

I recognize the historical perspective that he brings to resolutions and considerations of this kind, not only because he has a little history and longevity here in the Senate but also because he is a former professor and has a sense of history prior to coming here to this body.

It is interesting to hear my friend on the other side, the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, (Mr. PELL) talk about the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. I am not sure it has been brought to the attention of the body in the consideration of the President's desire to have an 18-month authorization of our peacekeeping force in Lebanon, but the Gulf of Tonkin resolution is so different, Mr. President, from the resolution we are considering at the moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Will the Senator from Rhode Island yield me some time?

Mr. PELL. I am glad to yield an additional minute to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. May I have 3 minutes?

Mr. PELL. We only have 4 minutes remaining on this side.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Does anybody else want to speak on the Senator's side?

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I would want about 45 seconds or a minute.

Mr. PELL. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, the Gulf of Tonkin resolution states, not only as the Senator from Rhode Island has said, that the President has the ability to "take all necessary measures to repel any armed attack against the forces of the United States and to prevent further aggression." It also says,

> The United States is, therefore, prepared, as the President determines, to take all necessary steps, including the use of armed force, to assist a member or protocol state of the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty requesting assistance in defense of its freedom.

That is an extraordinarily broad statement in that resolution.

Furthermore, the resolution goes on to say that:

> This resolution shall expire when the President shall determine that the peace and security of the area is reasonably assured by international conditions created by action of the United Nations or otherwise, except that it may be terminated earlier by concurrent resolution of the Congress.

But the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, Mr. President, certainly cannot be analogized to this resolution that is limited, except for the end of one sentence in section 3 where it is limited to a small degree regarding protective measures. Also, the President has, by letters to this body, said that if he is required to make any substantial change he will come to Congress.

Therefore, Mr. President, I believe that the Gulf of Tonkin resolution really cannot be accurately brought up as an issue at this time. That resolution was at a different time, a different resolution, and certainly the wording of it was far broader and without the meaningful limitations as contained in this resolution, plus the letters that accompany it have limited it.

This resolution deals with the Tonkin Gulf concerns by putting limitations on the scope and involvement of the U.S. forces. It incorporates references to the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act and the September 25 exchange of letters with the Government of Lebanon. Section 7(b) of the resolution specifically states that:

> Nothing in this joint resolution modifies, limits, or supersedes any provision of the War Powers Resolution or the requirement of Section 4 (a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, relating to Congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon.

That act, which President Reagan signed into law on June 27 of this year, requires congressional authorization for "any substantial expansion in the number or role in Lebanon of U.S. Armed Forces."

President Reagan, in his letter of September 27 to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator PERCY, reaffirmed his intention to seek congressional authorization "if circumstances require any substantial expansions in the number or role of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon."

I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the text of the President's letter and the Tonkin Gulf resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibits 1 and 2.)

Section 3 of this pending resolution states that the U.S. participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon:

> * * * shall be subject to the limitations, specified in the agreement establishing the Multinational Force in Lebanon as set forth in the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982, except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to ensure the safety of the multinational force in Lebanon.

This makes clear that the U.S. forces are to operate in the Beirut area. The exchange of letters says the role is "provide the multinational presence requested by the Lebanese Government to assist it and the Lebanese Armed Forces in the Beirut area."

Furthermore, the text of Senate Joint Resolution 159 itself says that the congressional intent is to authorize the Marines for the Beirut area. Section 5(a) says that Congress believes it should continue to be the policy of the United States to help in the "* * * establishing an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area."

Additionally the formal report of Committee on Foreign Relations on Senate Joint Resolution 159, Report No. 98-242 (printed on page 25748 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Sept. 26, 1983) states:

> The Committee understands that the role of the Marines is limited. The authorization of the presence of the Marines does not remove previous limitations on their deployment. Marine activities are restricted to the "Beirut area."

Thus it is misleading to portray the resolution as a blank check or Tonkin Gulf resolution.

A. TONKIN GULF RESOLUTION

[PUBLIC LAW 88-408 [H.J. RES. 1145] 78 STAT. 384, APPROVED AUGUST 10, 1964]

[A JOINT RESOLUTION To promote the maintenance of international peace and security in Southeast Asia.

[Whereas naval units of the Communist regime in Vietnam, in violation of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of international law, have deliberately and repeatedly attacked United States naval vessels lawfully present in international waters, and have thereby created a serious threat to international peace; and

[Whereas these attacks are part of a deliberate and systematic campaign of aggression that the Communist regime in North Vietnam has been waging against its neighbors and the nations joined with them in the collective defense of their freedom; and

[Whereas the United States is assisting the peoples of southeast Asia to protect their freedom and has no territorial, military or political ambitions in that area, but desires only that these peoples should be left in peace to work out their own destinies in their own way: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress approves and supports the determination of the President, as Commander in Chief, to take all necessary measures to repel any armed attack against the forces of the United States and to prevent further aggression.

[Sec. 2. The United States regards as vital to its national interest and to world peace the maintenance of international peace and security in southeast Asia. Consonant with the Constitution of the United States and the Charter of the United Nations and in accordance with its obligations under the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty, the United States is, therefore, prepared, as the President determines, to take all necessary steps, including the use of armed force, to assist any member or protocol state of the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty requesting assistance in defense of its freedom.

[Sec. 3. This resolution shall expire when the President shall determine that the peace and security of the area is reasonably assured by international conditions created by action of the United Nations or otherwise, except that it may be terminated earlier by concurrent resolution of the Congress.]

SEPTEMBER 27, 1983.

Hon. CHARLES H. PERCY,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHUCK: I know you were as gratified as I with Sunday's announcement of a cease fire in Lebanon. While there were many things that contributed to the cease fire, it is my belief that your agreement to advance the compromise resolution on war powers—and the favorable action by the Foreign Affairs and Foreign Relations Committees—were particularly important. At a crucial point, your agreement and the supporting committee actions expressed a commitment to bipartisanship in U.S. foreign policy. Please accept my thanks.

Let me also take this opportunity to clarify an issue with respect to the interpretation of the compromise resolution. The compromise resolution refers to the requirements of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act; I gather that a question has arisen as to the Executive Branch's understanding and intention in this regard. My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act: It would be my intention to seek Congressional authorization—as contemplated by the Act—if circumstances require any substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. armed forces in Lebanon.

In addition, regarding the Administration's intentions with respect to the 18-month time period, I can assure you that if our forces are needed in Lebanon beyond the 18-month period, it would be my intention to work together with the Congress with a view toward taking action on mutually acceptable terms.

Again let me thank you for your support for the compromise agreement. I believe its prompt enactment will only further improve the chances for the stable peace we seek in Lebanon.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. PERCY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has no further time.

The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. The Senator from Illinois used up all of his time. I yield 60 seconds to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. PERCY. Is it possible—we have an emergency time situation with Senator SPECTER. We would require, I think, no more than 3 minutes.

Mr. PELL. I only have 3 minutes remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has to point out that the Senator from Illinois has no further time. The Senator from Rhode Island has 3½ minutes remaining.

Mr. PELL. I yield a minute to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. PERCY. If we could have 1 minute, we could put the statements in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, when I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 159 on the 12th of September, the original text provided for a 6-month extension, the statutory 60 days, plus an additional 120 days. In the committee, that was amended to 18 months.

I said at the time I introduced the resolution that there was nothing magic about 6 months. But I must confess to the Senate that I think there is something a little more magic about 6 months than about 18 months. The argument is made that if it is only 6 months, the Government of Syria will wait us out. But there is another side to that point. If it is 18 months, those parties to this dispute who prefer the status quo will hunker down and not make the best effort to reconcile the differences because of the extended period of time.

Mr. President, I am still of the view that 6 months is an adequate period of time. I am still of the view that 6 months will provide both the President and the Congress an adequate period to review the situation and to make a new decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Illinois and the remaining minute to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I rise in support of this amendment by my distinguished friend from Rhode Island and would point out two things.

First of all, 18 months is too long a time. I again would refer my colleagues to the remarks made by Senator INOUYE last Friday. I will quote from them.

Only 11 months passed from the Normandy invasions on June 6, 1944, to the unconditional surrender of the Third Reich on May 7, 1945, an 11-month period during which, in the European theater alone, 135,576 Americans were killed in action and 451,052 were wounded.

World War I should also be remembered. From the time Congress declared war on April 6, 1917, to the capitulation of the German high command on November 11, 1918, 19 months passed, and 116,516 Americans lost their lives in combat.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a poll published in today's Washington Post, which supports the fact that an overwhelming majority of Americans support shortening this period of time to 6 months.

There being no objection, the poll was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

No opinion	16	11

Note: Figures are from a Washingotn Post-ABC News telephone poll of 1,506 people nationwide from Sept. 22 to 26.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I reluctantly rise in opposition to this amendment. I voted for the 6 months when it was offered in the Foreign Relations Committee because, like many others, I felt that 6 months was better than 18 months.

But my own feeling is that we are focusing on the wrong issue here. The issue is not 6 months or 18 months or 9 months or any other period of time. The issue ought to be what is the purpose, what is the mission, what is the strategy of having U.S. marines stationed in Lebanon as part of the multinational peacekeeping force? I do not think that issue has really been addressed.

Senator NUNN, of Georgia, I think clearly and intelligently pointed out that until those issues are resolved, we are really not doing ourselves justice or the peace issue justice in Lebanon by arguing over time.

If our purpose is clear, if our mission is clear, and our strategy is clear, I do not care whether it is 6 months, 18 months, 1½ years, 2 years, or 3 years, I think we would be able to support it if we understood why we were there and what we hope to accomplish.

So arguing about time agreements or periods of time I think is basically irrelevant; it is the wrong debate. Until we clearly decide what we are doing there the issue of time is secondary. Once that is decided, I would be willing to support whatever time is needed to achieve that mission, that purpose. For that reason, I will oppose the amendment.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 15 seconds remaining to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would have strongly preferred a decision by the Congress to extend the authorization for our Armed Forces in Lebanon only until the end of November—and to decide at that time whether to extend the period of their presence further. That is why I cosponsored and strongly supported the amendment offered by the Democratic leader.

The Senate has unfortunately failed to accept this amendment, which would have required a congressional determination before the Christmas recess. I now believe that, absent this opportunity, we should insist that the Congress review the presence of our armed forces in Lebanon as the first order of business after we return from the Christmas recess. I therefore support the amendment offered by Senator PELL, which would require a further congressional determination no later than the end of March—and I would hope as soon as possible in the new year—if our forces are to remain in Lebanon after that time.

Surely the Congress should display a continuing sense of responsibility if our marines are to remain in Lebanon after this year. I hope my colleagues will recognize the importance of this responsibility, and refuse to give the President a virtual blank check to keep our forces in Lebanon until 1985.

As I have said earlier in this debate, this wisest course for Congress to follow is to insist on periodic review of our military role in Lebanon—and at intervals short enough to permit us to act quickly in the wake of sudden changes in the circumstances of our involvement or a flareup in the hostilities. That is why I supported the Byrd amendment and why I still prefer a 6-month to an 18-month authorization period. I therefore hope that, at a minimum, my colleagues will agree to support this amendment.

Mr. PELL. The issue has been pretty well spelled out. The issue is whether we want 6 months or 18 months in a very difficult situation. That does not mean that there will be an automatic end to hostilities at the end of the 6 months or the 18 months.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to table the Pell amendment and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DURENBERGER). Is there any other Senator in the Chamber who desires to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 62, nays 38, as follows:

Mr. BAKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, we are rapidly running out of time, and according to the last count I have, we have five amendments yet to be disposed of. I urge Senators to proceed as fast as they can to avoid rollcall votes if they can, and, to try to further my own purposes, I will now sit down.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Pennsylvania be recognized next for a colloquy that will avoid an amendment, and then the distinguished Senator from Connecticut (Mr. DODD) be recognized on an amendment that the managers of the bill can accept for a time not to exceed 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. TSONGAS. Reserving the right to object; if the Senator could also include that my amendment will be next in line, I would appreciate it.

Mr. PERCY. I am sorry, I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. TSONGAS. That my amendment could then be the order.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I would so modify my unanimous-consent request that the next pending amendment after the Dodd amendment would be the Tsongas amendment for a time limited to——

Mr. TSONGAS. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. PERCY. Fifteen minutes?

Mr. TSONGAS. Equally divided.

Mr. PERCY. Ten minutes.

Mr. TSONGAS. I have two amendments. I will only introduce one, so I am going to save the committee 25 minutes, so I would like 5 of those 25. Fifteen minutes, equally divided.

Mr. PERCY. All right, I so modify my unanimous-consent request, and then the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) to be recognized next for a time not to exceed 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I have sought for the last 24 hours to have this colloquy with the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, pursuing an exchange which we had on Tuesday last when I expressed my concern about the possibility of having a declaration of war by implication or by having Congress delegate to the President our constitutional authority to make war. In that exchange Senator PERCY acknowledged that the fighting which had been going on in Lebanon was in fact "war." I expressed my concern about this resolution which might grant too much power to the President.

Since that exchange on Tuesday, there have been conversations involving ranking members of the President's White House staff and a briefing by ranking State Department officials, including the Acting Secretary of State, which I think can resolve the matter. They relate to the mission which is set forth in the President's letter of September 29, 1982, where the mission is limited to being an interposition force. And "interposition" as defined by Webster means "to place, to step in between parties at variance or stepping in to halt or settle a quarrel or conflict." So the purpose of the 1,400-man marine contingent is limited to that kind of an interposition force, and any further force—the 2,000 marines offshore or air power or naval power—would only be used in self-defense.

Thus, by passing this resolution we are not expanding the mission of that force in any way beyond that very limited mission.

If that can be made plain in this colloquy and with the acknowledgement of the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee that that is the Executive's agreement, then it is my view that the resolution does indeed sufficiently limit the Executive and is not a delegation of our responsibility to declare war or a declaration of war by implication.

I ask now the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee if my statement is an accurate statement of the executive branch's intention and of his understanding of the intention of this resolution.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the understanding of the Senator is exactly right.

The mandate of the MNF and the role of U.S. Forces have not changed since the MNF was introduced into Lebanon in September 1982. The Baker-Percy resolution does not expand it either.

The September 25, 1982, exchange of letters between the United States and Lebanese Governments states that the MNF mandate is "to provide an interposition force at agreed locations and, thereby, provide the multinational presence requested by the Lebanese Government to assist it and the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) in the Beirut area." The letters further state that "in carrying out its mission, the American Force will not engage in combat. It may, however, exercise the right of self-defense."

None of this has changed since September 1982. Their mission is still to provide a presence in the Beirut area that is generally supportive of the Lebanese Government. U.S. forces in Lebanon have no combat role; they have used force only to defend themselves, other MNF personnel, and other U.S. personnel in the Beirut area. (In the case of the Suq-al-Gharb fighting, U.S. forces provided naval artillery support to help prevent hostile elements from taking high ground that would have directly endangered our forces.)

The resolution will not change any of this. Section 3 of the resolution clearly states that the authorization granted for the continued participation of U.S. forces in the MNF will be limited to performance of the functions set forth in the September 1982 exchange of letters, and will be subject to the limitations stated in those letters.

There are references in other parts of the resolution (such as in section 2 and in the title) to broader objectives, such as the removal of all foreign forces, the restoration by the Lebanese Government of full control over its own territory, and progress toward national political reconciliation. These are statements of overall U.S. policy objectives in Lebanon, and it is customary for a resolution of this kind to make such a statement of general policy objectives; they are the same objectives that we have had since the MNF was first introduced into Lebanon, and were clearly stated then. But they are not statements of the mission of the MNF and U.S. forces, which are more limited. It is clearly section 3 that defines the authorized role of U.S. forces, and not these other policy statements.

Therefore, Congress is not being asked to authorize the President to use military force to expel foreign forces from Lebanon, or to reoccupy those parts of Lebanon now controlled by non-Government elements, or to intervene on behalf of the Lebanese Government to suppress internal Lebanese factions. The resolution simply authorizes the President to continue the current role and mission of U.S. forces.

Mr. President, I do hope that the response that I have given, which is fully supported by the administration, and is my understanding of the situation as it exists, will be entirely responsive to the distinguished Senator's question. I thank him for the questions that have been put to the Senate and to the managers of the bill which help us clarify an issue that may have also troubled other Senators.

Mr. SPECTER. So the language "to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its territory" is not mentioned in mission authorization?

Mr. PERCY. That is right.

Mr. SPECTER. And the only mission is that of the multinational force itself, as set forth in the President's letter of September 29, 1982?

Mr. PERCY. That is correct.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief question on this very significant point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for the colloquy has expired. It will take unanimous consent.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, if what the Senator from Illinois has said is accurate, it seems to me we have to change the resolution. We cannot change by a dialog in this Chamber the actual words of the resolution. They say, "in order to restore full control of the Government of Lebanon over its own territory."

If that dialog that just took place is accurate, it seems to me an amendment would be essential that would strike those words because that is what is stated is the purpose of the multinational force in section 2 finding and purpose of Congress.

I urge the Senator from Illinois to accept an amendment that would strike the words on page 3, line 12, "in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory."

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I simply point out I have an amendment that deals with this issue which we will be voting upon within a half hour.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has that amendment. I hope the Senator from Illinois will strike those words.

This would not cure all the problems we have without a clear mission. But we will have not at least made the situation significantly worse by this resolution as it presently is.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I wish to point out that the mandate is very clear.

I wish to repeat a basic point that I did make yesterday.

Some Members have argued that this resolution is too open ended because its title and policy sections indicate a series of broad objectives which go beyond the actual mandate of the current multinational force.

We do have broad objectives in Lebanon, as I pointed out yesterday, and it is entirely appropriate that we should say so in a resolution of this kind.

Every piece of legislation contains such a section, but as every Member knows, such provisions are not the sections which provide authority. We only go back to those sections which provide authority.

The actual authorization in sections 3 and 6 of this resolution is a limited one, in support of our broader objectives, but not extending to the open-ended fulfillment of those goals by the multinational force. I thought we made that point at length yesterday.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PERCY. I yield.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, I have an amendment that goes exactly to that point. I hope the chairman will accept it. If that indeed is the case, then there is no reason why the amendment would not be accepted. If the amendment is not accepted, then one would presume it is not the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order the time for the colloquy has expired.

AMENDMENT NO. 2238

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I have an amendment I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Connecticut (Mr. DODD) for himself and Mr. KENNEDY proposes an amendment numbered 2238.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 7, line 25, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof "; or"; and after line 25, insert the following:

(4) the withdrawal of all other countries from participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I offer this amendment on behalf of myself and the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY).

Mr. President, this amendment requires only a brief explanation. It is straightforward and self-explanatory. It adds one additional condition to those in section 6 which provide for the termination of the authorization of our participation in the multinational force in Lebanon short of the 18-month deadline. The other conditions are the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon which is, of course, one to the prime objectives of the whole undertaking; the assumption of the functions of the multinational force by the United Nations or the Government of Lebanon; or other security arrangements that would make the force's presence unnecessary.

To these conditions my amendment adds a fourth one, the withdrawal of all other countries from the multinational force. In that eventuality we, too, should withdraw as the rationale for our participation was built squarely on the existence of the multinational force and that rationale would cease to exist with the dissolution of the accord establishing the force. To put it a little more colloquially, we should not be left standing there holding the bag.

I think all of us deeply appreciate the importance of acting in accord with our French, Italian, and British allies. I hope our common undertaking will succeed soon and we can all withdraw. If, however, the situation deteriorates, for example, the multinational force were to suffer heavy casualties, it is certainly conceivable that our allies may decide to pull out. My amendment says that if the French, the Italian, and the British forces are withdrawn from Lebanon, we will not be left to carry on alone.

Mr. President, this amendment is identical to the one that was approved last week by the House Foreign Affairs Committee. It is, therefore, included in the resolution that was sent to the whole House of Represenatives by a 30 to 6 vote of that committee.

I urge my colleagues to adopt this amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the debate regarding the Baker-Percy resolution so far has centered largely on the application of the war powers resolution, the length of the period for which Congress should authorize the continued deployment of U.S. forces in Lebanon, and the definition of their mission. There is an additional area which requires attention: the interrelationship of our forces and those of our three European partners in the multinational force.

I am pleased to cosponsor with Senator DODD an amendment which was adopted by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs and is in the House version of our resolution. This amendment adds a fourth circumstance under which U.S. forces must be withdrawn before the end of the period for which we authorize them to be deployed in Lebanon. Section 6 of the resolution specifies three circumstances for early withdrawal—First, withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon; second, the assumption by the U.N. or the Lebanese Government of the responsibilities of the multinational force, or third, the implementation of other effective security arrangements in the area. This amendment would add a fourth condition requiring withdrawal of U.S. forces if the other countries in the multinational force withdraw their troops. In this situation, U.S. forces could remain in Lebanon only with the specific reauthorization by Congress.

The stakes in Lebanon are international, as indicated by the presence of French, Italian, and British as well as American troops in the Beirut area. We all have an interest in insuring that a strong and representative central government is restored in Lebanon and that all external forces are withdrawn. However, recent press reports indicate some of our partners have raised questions over how much longer and under what circumstances they themselves are willing to participate in the multinational force. In view of these reports and recent developments, I believe it incumbent on the Congress to reemphasize that the multinational force must remain truly multinational. The burdens of defending common interests must be shared by all: They must not become the unilateral responsibility of the United States.

The United States is prepared to play its proper role in Lebanon. However, we must play this role in close cooperation with our allies who share our interests. We owe it to the American people and our marines in Beirut to insure that they have the international support they deserve and, failing that, they are not left to fight alone in circumstances that have changed completely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I previously discussed this with the majority leader. He is not on the floor at this time. At the time, he indicated that so long as this is identical to the amendment which appears in the House bill and which the administration has accepted, he would have no objection to it. I have no objection to it. I know of no objections from other Members on this side of the aisle. Therefore, I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. PELL. I yield back my time.

Mr. PERCY. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2238) was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2239

(Purpose: to state that U.S. participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is in order to maintain a secure area from which the Government of Lebanon can restore full control over its own territory)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) proposes an amendment numbered 2239: on page 3, lines 12 and 13, after "(2) in order to", strike "restore full control by the Government of Lebanon" and insert in lieu thereof "maintain a secure area from which the Government of Lebanon can restore full control".

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, this is not a new issue. In fact, it was the subject of a colloquy between the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the committee.

The administration has made it clear, and indeed I think everyone agrees, that the area of operation of our marines in Lebanon is restricted to the Beirut area. If one goes back and looks at the letters of exchange between the Government of the United States and the Government of Lebanon, dated September 25, 1982, one is struck by the fact that the reference to the Beirut area occurs four times in the letter of Robert Dillon, Ambassador of the United States, and is mentioned four times in the corresponding letter from the Lebanese Government.

That is something we are all in accord with, and the colloquy between the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Pennsylvania reaffirms that.

The question arises: How is that consistent with the testimony of Secretary Shultz before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee? If one looks at page 4, the Secretary stated three objectives in Lebanon: The withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon, a sovereign, independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity, and able to exercise its authority throughout its national territory.

There is no reference in these objectives to the restriction geographically of our marines to the Beirut area. The question is, Are they restricted or are they not restricted? The colloquy says they are, and my amendment simply affirms in the legislative history that that, indeed, is the case. I would find it very difficult to understand how the colloquy could take place and this amendment would not be agreed to. The language under the findings section reads: "In order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory."

Implicit in that language is the capacity for the marines not only to operate in the Beirut area, as the letters of exchange would argue, but also, by these findings, they are now empowered to act beyond that. Indeed, you could read that to include all of Lebanon.

That is not what we intend; that is not what the American people want; that is not what the administration says it wants.

So I hope that if everyone is being reasonably true to their professed statements, the amendment will be agreed to. Simply put, the amendment puts into language the realization, I think, of everyone, that the mandate in support of our marines in Lebanon goes only to the Beirut area and does not extend throughout Lebanon. We do not want a wider war. We simply want a peacekeeping mission, and that is what the amendment seeks to insure.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TSONGAS. I yield.

Mr. BIDEN. If the Senator's amendment is agreed to and this resolution is passed, does that bind the President not to use the marines outside the Beirut area?

Mr. TSONGAS. Yes, it does. The only possible exception to it would be the question of defense. No one would restrict that. It would restrict the operation to the Beirut area, which is mentioned eight times in the exchange of letters. My answer is, yes, it would.

Mr. BIDEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMPSON). Who yields time?

If neither side yields time, it runs equally against both sides.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, while we are sitting here, I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. TSONGAS. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I think that what the Senator from Massachusetts is attempting to do is laudable. My concern is that I believe this legislation, as it now stands, is so fatally flawed that even if this amendment were agreed to, it would not protect what I think is the most obvious concern I have. It would not correct the most obvious concern, and that is that we still have not had a clear definition of what constitutes the mission of the marines and whether or not that mission is the same as is stated in the preamble and the findings of this resolution—whether or not we are talking about still having as the three main objectives the requirement that there be control of all Lebanon, and so forth.

So I suppose my question is this, and I applaud the Senator for his effort: Does the Senator believe that if this amendment were agreed to and there were no perfecting amendments, this legislation would then be acceptable?

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, I reserve the right on final passage, but I simply say that the question of mission bothers all of us. This, in essence, states that the mission is restricted in the letters to Beirut, and at least the parameters in which we can worry have been significantly reduced.

Mr. BIDEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I see no other Senator seeking recognition. Accordingly, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do not want to hurry anybody along, but it is 12 minutes after 1 and, by statute, we are going to have to vote at 2 o'clock on whatever is pending. Right at this minute there is an amendment pending and then the committee substitute is pending, and that is the end of that. So I urge, since there are other amendments, that we get on with the business at hand and not let the quorum call run any longer.

I also beseech Senators to keep their remarks as short as possible and to take voice votes if they can.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, I am prepared to vote. I will simply say there are some of us who would like to be able to vote for this resolution were it not a totally partisan resolution. The amendment simply codifies the statements that have been made. Rejection of the amendment, if indeed that takes place, will cause many of us to wonder what the mission really is, and, for that reason, we will not be able to support the resolution in final passage.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, let me just say this for 30 seconds, so nobody misunderstands. I am sympathetic to the Senator from Massachusetts. I hope he will consider supporting this resolution.

But I also want him to know, as I believe he does know, that this resolution has been the product of extensive negotiations between the White House, the Speaker, the minority leader in the House, and the majority leadership here. This language was indeed submitted to the Speaker and to others, Mr. MICHEL and Senator PERCY. So it is not just a partisan arrangement. It is one where a great deal of effort has gone into an arrangement that I hope the Senate will confirm. But there is no trace of partisanism involved in it. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts can see his way clear to support the resolution as it is finally presented on final passage.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time on the Tsongas amendment. I ask unanimous consent that immediately following the Levin amendment, Senator EAGLETON be recognized for 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TSONGAS. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I think the attempt being made by the Senator from Massachusetts is laudable. I think the fact that it is only amending the findings section and not the authorization section flaws it somewhat in terms of it being able to work. To quote one of the competent staff persons here when I asked about it, he said: "It is a little like attempting to fix a flat tire on a car that has been totaled."

For that reason, I will be voting against it.

Mr. TSONGAS. I no longer yield to the Senator from Delaware.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to table. All in favor say "aye." Opposed, "no."

Mr. TSONGAS. I object. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the yeas and nays have not been requested on the motion to table.

Mr. TSONGAS. Then I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) to table the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS). The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), is necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any other Senator in the Chamber who desires to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 42, as follows:

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER FOR 10-MINUTE ROLLCALL VOTES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that rollcall votes from this moment forward be 10 minutes instead of 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I urge Senators to remain on the floor. In this last rollcall, we missed two Senators because they were not here and we were 5 minutes over. We are now 23 minutes before the statutory time. We have 10-minute rollcalls ordered, so I beseech Senators to remain here on the floor.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Michigan, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to call up my amendment at this time. It is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I understand there will be a unanimous-consent request to lay that aside. Is that correct?

Mr. EAGLETON. Yes, of course, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2233

(Purpose: To revise the contents of the report)

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I call up my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON) proposes an amendment numbered 2233.

On page 5, line 4, strike out "protective" and insert "defensive".

On page 5, between lines 14 and 15, insert the following:

(1) the results of efforts to secure removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon and to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory;

On page 5, line 15, strike out "(1)" and insert "(2)".

On page 5, line 17, strike out "(2)" and insert "(3)".

On page 5, line 21, strike out "(3)" and insert "(4)".

On page 5, line 23, strike out "(4)" and insert "(5)".

On page 6, line 3, strike out "(5)" and insert "(6)".

On page 7, line 1, strike out "(3)" and insert "(4)".

Mr. EAGLETON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be laid aside for the Levin amendment and that the vote on my amendment occur after the Levin amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I want to make it clear that I have not forfeited my rights to move to table either the amendment of the Senator from Missouri or the Senator from Michigan. Will the Chair confirm that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those rights are protected.

Mr. EAGLETON. I thank the Senator from Michigan. I thank the majority leader.

AMENDMENT NO. 2240

(Purpose: To establish that American troops in Lebanon are in a situation in which hostilities exist)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator RANDOLPH and myself, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) for himself and Mr. RANDOLPH, proposes an amendment numbered 2240.

On page 4, line 5, between "(b)" and "The" insert the following: "Actual or imminent hostilities involving U.S. Armed Forces came into being on August 29, 1983."

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, this amendment would add one sentence to section 2(b) as follows: "Actual or imminent hostilities involving U.S. armed forces came into being on August 29, 1983." This amendment is necessary because the resolution now before us only asserts that the Congress declares that hostilities exist. That is very different from stating as a matter of fact rather than congressional finding that hostilities did in fact commence on August 29. If the President affixes his signature to language which asserts that Congress declares hostilities exist, he is not necessarily agreeing with that statement.

Our amendment, if adopted and signed by the President, would constitute a joint finding in the resolution that hostilities have existed since our marines were killed and wounded on August 29, 1983.

The rationale for such a clear statement of fact is simply this: The war powers resolution should be tested on constitutional grounds and not on the question of whether or not hostilities existed which would have triggered the war powers resolution procedures.

Our amendment focuses the question on the constitutional issues. It eliminates any escape clause which a dispute about whether hostilities existed might provide.

Mr. President, it is clear that the Congress is reluctant to force a constitutional confrontation with the President. The House has approved a resolution similar to the one we are debating today, and the Senate has defeated the amendment offered by Senator BYRD which would have required the President to recognize the constitutionality of the war powers resolution and bow to its procedures.

The President has made it clear that he is unwilling to do that because he believes the resolution is unconstitutional. The Byrd amendment which I supported would have resolved the constitutional dispute between Congress and the President, but the Congress is obviously not going to do that. So we are leaving the constitutional issue open asserting congressional authority under the war powers resolution but not requiring the President to formally acknowledge it.

However, that reluctance to force that issue should not extend to issues which do not involve constitutional interpretations. The question of whether hostilities existed since August 29 is only a matter of fact, and the answer to that question is clear. While our amendment would put the answer to that question in this resolution, it is important to note what it would not do. It would not tie the President's hands. It would not cast into doubt the authorization contained in this resolution for the commitment of American troops in Lebanon. It would not involve any delay in that commitment which becomes effective as soon as the resolution is signed. Let the test be the constitutionality of the war powers resolution, not whether there are hostilities in Lebanon. If the legislative and executive branches cannot agree on our respective powers, for Heaven's sake let us at least agree that hostilities existed as of August 29, 1983.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I will reluctantly vote to take the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan. My decision is taken only because the statutory time limits in the War Powers Act of 1973 mandate that we must obtain final passage of a joint resolution in the next 10 minutes. I am informed that Speaker O'NEILL will not bargain with the Senate over any differences between the House and Senate versions. What this means is that if we adopt any amendment at this stage, we will obtain no bill at all.

I am sure the authors of one War Powers Act did not have that kind of trap in mind 10 years ago, but we must live with it now.

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Michigan has—as often he does—recognized the key issue here. As I pointed out in my remarks 2 days ago, it is the foreign policy issues that we often debate when we talk about things like time limits, and other issues. But the crucial constitutional issues raised by this—the first test of the War Powers Act—have to some extent gone unnoticed in a debate over the Middle East.

As I stated earlier, I strongly believe in the War Powers Act. Congress must accept its responsibilities under that act. One such responsibility, of course, is to share in policy. Another, however, is to preserve congressional prerogatives in this murky area of shared powers.

By seeking to avoid any possible misinterpretations about when the War Powers Act comes into effect, the Senator from Michigan is being vigilant. In an area as crucial as the War Powers Act, we must avoid constitutional ambiguity. Although his amendment was tabled, I am certain that Senator LEVIN's efforts here will not go unnoticed. In that sense, he may very well have accomplished what he set out to do, for his arguments should make clear that this act became effective August 29. That means that authority will expire exactly 18 months thereafter, and no later.

Mr. President, I regret having to vote to table, but I thank Senator LEVIN for raising this crucial point.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has 1 minute and 30 seconds.

Mr. LEVIN. I yield 30 seconds to my distinguished friend from West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the amendment which has just been discussed by the able Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) is one of truth. It is one of realism. Members, regardless of the separation of the aisles, should recognize that we have a responsibility, and that is to follow the situation that has developed in the use of the marines in Lebanon. I agree with my able colleague's statement that this amendment will not tie the President's hands. It is important that the President and Congress equally acknowledge and recognize the period of hostilities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Who yields time?

If neither side yields time, the time runs equally.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been requested. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the yeas and nays be ordered in the event a tabling motion is offered to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

(The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to table the Levin amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays. I remind Senators of a 10-minute vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been previously requested and ordered.

Mr. BAKER. On the tabling motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the tabling motion.

Mr. BAKER. I had not made the tabling motion. How did that work?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By the Chair, by unanimous-consent.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair. I am very grateful.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Kansas (Mrs. KASSEBAUM) is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 45—as follows:

NOT VOTING—1

Kassebaum

So the motion to lay on the table amendment No. 2240 was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MATHIAS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am going to propound a unanimous-consent request, in an effort to avoid chaos, because we have at least two amendments that I know of still pending. We have one other technical amendment that I think needs to be addressed, and it is 2 p.m.

Mr. President, I have not had time to consult with the minority leader yet, but I state a request now for his consideration and that of all Senators.

First, I ask unanimous consent that notwithstanding the hour of 2 p.m., the time be extended sufficiently to accommodate the vote on the technical amendment to be offered by Senator MATHIAS and next, of course, it requires no unanimous consent to have the vote on the Eagleton amendment, and final passage.

Mr. President, the minority leader and I have relinquished our time for final statements. I ask unanimous consent that he may have 1 minute and I may have 1 minute just before final passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

AMENDMENT NO. 2233

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, this is a very simple amendment.

There has been much Senate floor debate on the "except" clause of section 3 of the resolution. That clause reads: "* * * except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to insure the safety of the Multinational Force in Lebanon."

During the debate it has been labeled as a "blank check," "a loophole a mile wide," et cetera, et cetera. The first part of my amendment seeks to tighten up that clause by substituting the word "defensive" for the word "protective" in the aforementioned "except" clause.

The word "defend" means "to take action against attack or challenge." The word "defensive" means "devoted to resisting or preventing aggression or attack." (See Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary.)

"Protect" or "protective" are, qualitatively speaking, broader words. "Protective" is a more ambiguous word and susceptible to a somewhat broader interpretation than "defensive."

Webster's New Dictionary of Synonyms defines "defend" as "implies the use of means to ward off something that actually threatens or to repel something that actually attacks." According to Webster's usage, "protect" is a more "indirect" term.

The greatest semanticist ever to serve in the Senate, our former colleague S. I. Hayakawa has analyzed the difference between "protect" and "defend." In Modern Guide to Synonyms (Funk & Wagnalls, edited by S. I. Hayakawa), Senator Hayakawa states "protect is the most general term." "Defend" is more specific; "it emphasizes present danger."

The second part of my amendment adds an additional section to section 4, the reports to the Congress section of the resolution.

It reads as follows:

"First, the results of efforts to secure removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon and to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory;"

It is really nothing new in that it merely picks up sections 2(a)(1) and 2(a)(2) of the findings and purpose section of the resolution and requires the President to report thereon along with the other items in section 4.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, is the question now on the Eagleton amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the Eagleton amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I move to table the Eagleton amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The question is on agreeing to the motion to table the amendment. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, do I understand that one other amendment is qualified and in order, and that is the amendment of the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS)?

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent.

The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 2241

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) proposes an amendment numbered 2241.

On page 8, line 23, delete the phrase "the yeas and nays." and substitute the words

"pursuant to its rules", and place a period after the word "rules.".

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, this is a technical amendment to conform to the House procedures. I know of no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS).

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, at this point, the pending question is the adoption of the committee substitute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the business at hand.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, we are going to have a vote on final passage. I hope we do not have two rollcall votes, one on the substitute and one on final passage. I am prepared now for the Chair to put the question on the substitute.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no quarrel with that, because it would be voting on the same thing twice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee substitute, as amended.

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, the issue before us today is how Congress should perform its most solemn responsibility under the Constitution. Congress has not just a right but an obligation to play a significant role in decisions affecting war, peace, and the provision and operation of our Armed Forces. It is vital that Congress fulfill this duty in a nuclear age. Therefore, I favor immediate invocation of the War Powers Act as stipulated in the Baker-Percy resolution.

Mr. President, if Congress wishes to insure the vitality of the War Powers Act, we cannot afford to adopt a wait-and-see attitude. Such a policy can only be interpreted as acquiescence and a shirking of our responsibilities.

It is not simply because of the provisions in the Constitution or in the War Powers Act that Congress must be involved in the continued presence of American forces in the hostilities in Lebanon. The American people have a right to a voice in decisions that affect their lives and those of their sons and daughters. The War Powers Act was originally promulgated to insure that. The Congress cannot now evade its obligations under the law to protect the people from involvement in an unnecessary or unwanted war.

My distinguished colleague, Senator DODD, will be interested to learn that earlier this month I received a letter from a mother in Connecticut whose son is a marine stationed in Beirut. Her frustration and anger were not easy to respond to. I, too, am frustrated when young Americans die in distant corners of the globe. Nevertheless, it is clear that we cannot withdraw the marines from Lebanon at this time. It is this Senator's hope that the administration's efforts will result in an agreement that allows us to bring our boys home soon.

In summary, Mr. President, let me reemphasize my support for the President's policy of maintaining and protecting our forces in Lebanon. Let me also reiterate my belief that Congress must act, and act now, by invoking the War Powers Act according to the terms of the Baker-Percy resolution.●

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the resolution before us on both substantive and procedural grounds. I believe it would be a grave mistake for the Senate to in one stroke expose the American people to the risk of involvement in a broad Middle East war and to surrender the hard-won reaffirmation of congressional warmaking power. The reality of these issues could not be greater, the best efforts of the President and the congressional leadership to clothe them in less momentous terms notwithstanding.

Mr. President, from the very beginning I have been leery of the presence of U.S. troops in the shooting gallery which has taken the place of a sovereign Lebanon. The irresistible force of historic grievances between various Lebanese religious and secular factions, between Syria and the Central Government and the PLO against them all, has not, can not and will not yield to the presence of this peacekeeping force. I do not want U.S. troops in a quagmire of historical differences when the Lebanese people themselves are unwilling to reconcile those differences into firmer ground.

The ominous presence of 2,000 marines offshore, a flotilla of ships, including the venerable U.S.S. New Jersey, and U.S. war planes on patrol over Beirut, all raise astronomically the potential for full-scale involvement. The specter of our escalating presence in the region for the extended period allowed in this resolution should give every Member of this Senate considerable pause.

As for the War Powers Resolution, I was moved by the statement of Chairman STENNIS on this floor yesterday. During most of his three decades in the Senate, JOHN STENNIS has presided over Senate defense policy, and he personifies the institutional memory of this body. He asked of the Vietnam tragedy: "How in the world did we get ourselves involved in this war?" His resolve in the aftermath of that war was to enact legislation to restore the constitutional place of the Congress when committing American lives and resources to armed conflict. That effort is the War Powers Resolution, which is being tested for the first time in this instance.

I submit, Mr. President, that should this resolution pass the Senate, the hope of past and future Chief Executives of the United States will be fulfilled: That the War Powers Act be rendered meaningless in application.

I assume the President hoped to improve the prospects of this resolution through the letter he wrote to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. It has the opposite effect on this Senator. The doubts I have about the vagueness and latitude of this resolution are confirmed by the perceived need to clarify it. The Senate will not be voting on the President's letter. No future President would be bound by it. Nothing but what is within the four corners of this resolution matters.

And what lies therein is unacceptable. Eighteen months is an inordinate amount of time for the Senate to suspend its control over the situation. Regardless of what the resolution says about Congress reserving its right to withdraw the troops at any time by the concurrent resolution mechanism of section 5(c) of the war powers resolution, it is the expressed opinion of the Department of State that that authority was stripped away by the Chadha legislative veto decision. We should not depend on that mechanism.

The description of the role which our troops can play under this authorization is so vague as to invite flexible interpretation of this document by the administration. I was as flexible as I intend to be on this matter when I supported the President on the initial U.S. involvement in a multinational peacekeeping force. My flexibility was predicated on the minimal assumption that all the Lebanese—if not the Syrians, PLO, and Israelis—would dedicate themselves to a unified and peaceful Lebanon. That minimum requirement has not been achieved. I do not expect American lives to be sacrificed for a Lebanese people unwilling to sacrifice their age-old animosities.●

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, we find ourselves once again in what seems to be an increasingly frequent event in the Senate—a protracted debate over an exceptionally complex and emotional issue of foreign policy. The result will be a vote or a series of votes whose outcome will completely satisfy no one and, indeed, will prove to be more of a signpost along a continuing journey than any sort of definitive answer to the questions debated.

I cannot in good conscience vote for the Baker resolution, Mr. President, though I wish that I were able to do so. As my friend, the distinguished senior Senator from Mississippi, said earlier in the week, I have tried to convince myself to vote for it. But I just could not bring myself to it.

My inclination was to want to support the resolution because I strongly feel that issues of foreign policy must not be partisan. Any President of the United States, without regard to political party, is "Our" President and, in dealing with the world beyond the shores of the United States, he is and must be the spokesman for our interests.

No useful purpose can be served from pulling the rug from under the President. We must also realize that 535 Members of Congress cannot each act as Commander in Chief. I am willing to give the President more time to define our policy in Lebanon.

I do not favor a precipitous withdrawal of the international peacekeeping force in that tragic country. If we withdraw our troops in a hectic fashion, the other members of the force will likely do the same and the vacuum will be filled with more death and bloodshed.

However, when our goals in Lebanon have not even been clearly spelled out, I cannot justify giving a blank check authorization to commit American troops there for as long as 18 months. I would vote for a shorter period, but an 18-month authorization is too long. The total American involvement in World War I was only 19 months. Over 100,000 soldiers were killed in the last 18 months of World War II.

If the lives of Americans are to be put at risk, our goals and reasons need to be more clearly understood. If the goal is the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, it is naive to think that 1,200 marines can accomplish that result if it was not achieved by 40,000 Israeli troops with many casualties. Indeed, as Senator SAM NUNN has pointed out, there has hardly been a time in the entire history of Lebanon when such a goal was accomplished.

Whatever the outcome of the vote on this resolution, it is imperative that Congress and the administration work together to more clearly define our goals. The discussion should focus on why our troops are in Lebanon and what we hope to accomplish.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, the Senate is now considering an item of legislation that concerns one of the most important national issues to come before us in many years. I am referring to Senate Joint Resolution 166, invoking the 1973 war powers resolution with regard to our Armed Forces now stationed in Lebanon.

As Congress acts to reaffirm its pivotal role in questions of war and peace, a favorable vote on this resolution will be a constitutional landmark. President Reagan, our majority leader (Mr. BAKER), and Speaker O'NEILL worked together in the national interest on this resolution, and they deserve our thanks for the efforts that brought about this compromise. But it is clear that no one is entirely satisfied with the resolution before us today, or the situation in Lebanon. And I am not, either. Let us hope that the temporary cease-fire will work and become permanent.

The United States is clearly in favor of three objectives there: withdrawal of all foreign forces; a unified, independent Lebanon; and the stability and security of Israel's northern border. Whether presence of our marines and naval forces in Lebanon will guarantee these objectives is not clear as the Senate moves toward a vote on the resolution.

It is evident that 1,600 U.S. marines, a battleship, several destroyers, and their crews will never drive from Lebanon the heavily armed, deeply committed troops of Syria, the PLO, Iran, and Israel. President Gemayel and the brave soldiers of the Lebanese Army have shown fierce courage, but Lebanese unity seems difficult if not impossible.

The legitimate Government of Lebanon under President Gemayel is intact, but battered; and the brave, new Army of Lebanon is intact, but exhausted and under constant attack. If either fails before the 18-month term of the resolution expires, any hope for the United States to achieve its three objectives will also fail. I am confident that the President would then move without delay to withdraw our ground forces in Lebanon.

I understand the President's desire to keep his commitments to President Gemayel and the soldiers of the Army of Lebanon, but I believe that the U.S. contingent of the multinational peacekeeping force is in grave danger of becoming involved in the latest chapter of Lebanon's long civil war. In that event, we should withdraw our Armed Forces as quickly as possible.

Mr. President, the major attraction of the Lebanon resolution now before the Senate is its superiority over the status quo and it is better than doing nothing. It is better than continued American participation in the hostilities in Lebanon without limit of time, number, or purpose. It is better also than a constitutional confrontation at this time over the 1973 war powers resolution.

This resolution on American Armed Forces in Lebanon is an opportunity for the President. He can use the extension of time to convince Congress and the American people that the presence of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon under hostile circumstances clearly serves U.S. national interests. If that is not possible, and I question whether it is possible, the President now has an opportunity to withdraw U.S. forces at his own pace. But I hope the President's advisers do not interpret congressional support for this resolution as a blank check. It clearly is not.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I believe that the resoluton before us is a workable compromise on the issue of the marines in Lebanon. Like all compromises, it has its problems, and certainly it will not please everyone. But it strikes a balance between two extremes, and in the end achieves what most of us in the Senate desire: Congressional consultation of this extremely important matter.

Before we can appreciate the balance that this resolution achieves, we must look at the extremes. On the one hand are those who believe that the War Powers Act is unconstitutional, and that the President has no obligation to consult with Congress regarding the commitment of American troops on foreign soil. They argue that any interference in the conduct of foreign policy by the Congress provides an incentive to our adversaries to drag their feet on negotiations, and to attempt to use American public opinion for their own purposes.

The problem with this argument is that it does not take into account the importance of building public support for American foreign policy. Recently, a number of American military writers have stressed the importance of building public support for any commitment abroad of U.S. troops. It seems clear to me that it is necessary to build this support through the Congress.

On the other hand, there are those who believe that Congress must approve in advance every step taken by the President in the conduct of foreign policy. Their great concern is that the United States will become involved in another Vietnam, which they constantly invoke as the cause of great anxiety. This argument, too, is flawed because it ignores the obvious fact that the President is the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, and as such, has certain constitutional prerogatives. It also ignores the fact that, as Alexander Hamilton wrote in "Federalist 70": "Energy in the Executive is a leading character in the definition of good Government." particularly with regard to the conduct of foreign affairs. There can be such a thing as too much congressional interest in foreign policy, which can have the effect of hamstringing the President, and undermining energy in the Executive.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this compromise avoids the defects of both these extremes. It requires that the President acknowledge the role of the Congress in the conduct of foreign policy. It puts the President on notice that he must build public support for U.S. policy in Lebanon, and it helps to defuse the potential explosiveness of a catastrophic partisonship in our Middle East policy.

At the same time, this compromise gives the President the flexibility to deal with the exigencies of the situation, and the timeframe is right: Anything less would be likely to have the effect feared by critics of the War Powers Act. A shorter period allowed to the President might very well convince the Syrians that they have only to bide their time. It might also have the effect of increasing the danger to our marines, subjecting them to more frequent attacks by those who, by causing more American casualties, would hope to arouse American public opinion against U.S. participation in the Lebanon peacekeeping force. And it should be noted that nothing requires the President to keep the troops in Lebanon for the full 18 months if they are not needed. They can certainly be withdrawn earlier if the situation permits.

I would conclude by observing that it is of vital interest to the United States that Lebanon exist as a peaceful, stable nation. The multinational peacekeeping force is critical to the attainment of this goal. Our marines, as a part of this force, are performing an extremely important task. I believe it would be fatal to the cause of peace in the Middle East, not to say disastrous for the future of U.S. foreign policy, to precipitously withdraw our marines from Lebanon. The resolution accomplishes what Congress desires without unnecessarily burdening the President in the execution of his constitutional prerogatives, and I believe it should be adopted.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, my primary concern is with the situation in which we now find ourselves militarily involved in Lebanon. Except to say that there are serious questions about the constitutionality of the War Powers Act, especially since the Supreme Court decision on the legislative veto, I will leave that argument to others.

At the present time we have a cease-fire in Lebanon. Our country is in a most delicate situation facing a host of very difficult problems that must be solved before a real peace can be achieved. A rejection of this bipartisan resolution, in my opinion, will make the cause of peace more difficult to achieve.

No one that I know is happy with the thought that our marines might still be in Lebanon in 18 months. We all hope and pray that they can be brought home as quickly as possible. If, however, we put a short limit on the congressional authorization, we would be encouraging factions to stay aloof from negotiations in the hope the marines or the multination force would be withdrawn. It would also not be in our best interest to have the resolution expire in the middle of a Presidential campaign. As much as possible, our actions should be bipartisan. This is difficult in the best of circumstances and would be nearly impossible in the midst of a hot Presidential race.

Mr. President, we are asking our U.S. marines to assume awesome duties in the most dangerous of settings. They must know that they have the full backing of this Congress. If we cannot give them that backing, we need to bring them home. Never again can our country allow American soldiers to be treated as they were in Vietnam.

There are obvious long-range dangers in Lebanon that concern me greatly. We must have realistic goals in Lebanon. This civil war has raged for many years. If the multination force can help bring about peace, the world will be a better, safer place. If this crisis seems destined to drag on for years, I do not believe the American people will tolerate using our marines as semipermanent buffers between the various rival factions in that country. I do not believe the American people would agree to massive increases in our military troops in Lebanon. Congress can maintain control through the appropriations process. Therefore, passing the resolution by no means gives the President a blank check in Lebanon.

The cease-fire is just the minimum beginning of a solution. The administration must develop and set forth their policies and objectives. When the policies and objectives are clearly set forth and aired before Congress, the administration can expect full public and congressional support.

The solution to this problem is not military. We must never forget that fact. All sides in this bitter war have to reach an agreement. The Government there has to broaden its popular support.

The Mideast has an opportunity for a chance at peace now. Withdrawing the multination force or indicating the United States is likely to withdraw them in 6 months would hurt that chance. For that reason, I will vote for this resolution. But I urge the administration to come forth with a more specific statement of our goals and objectives and how the U.S. presence in Lebanon will help achieve those objectives.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I strongly oppose this 18-month extension for the presence of U.S. Armed Forces in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon. Do we not ever learn? This is Gulf of Tonkin II, and it deserves to be repudiated by the Senate.

Congress won an extremely important showdown with the President last week over the application of the War Powers Act. How then can we give it all back today by bowing out of Lebanon for the next year and a half.

Are we too timid to exercise our constitutional responsibility? Did we write the War Powers Act into law because of Vietnam, only to write it off for 18 months in Lebanon?

Some say that Lebanon is not Vietnam. But I reply, we must not give the President the power to turn it into one. I reject any approach by Congress under the War Powers Act that says to President Reagan, "take 1,600 marines and the battleship New Jersey to Lebanon, and call us in 1985."

No one in this Chamber has a crystal ball clear enough to see the future of Lebanon. We do know, however, that America is deeply divided over our current role. There are fundamental questions not only about how long we should be there, but why we are there, and whether we should be there at all.

Our marines have a right to our support. But they also have a right to know that they are in Lebanon with the full approval of both Congress and the American people. They do not have that approval today, and it is irresponsible for Congress to write a blank check for the President over the next 18 months when we know he does not have the country behind him.

This resolution should be defeated.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, American soldiers have been deployed in Lebanon since August 1982. They were originally sent to Beirut as part of a multinational force to help evacuate the PLO from the Lebanese capital.

On September 11, 1983, the President withdrew those troops. But, on September 21, after the assassination of the newly elected president, Bashir Gemayal, President Reagan announced that he would send the marines back to Lebanon as part of an international peacekeeping mission.

At that time, several Senators, myself included, expressed serious reservations about the wisdom of this action. The President said that he did not expect the marines to become engaged in hostilities.

Unfortunately, that expectation has not been borne out by events. The evidence of hostilities is now unambiguous. Four marines have died within the past month. Over 30 have been wounded. Our troop presence in Beirut has expanded by one third. U.S. ships and aircraft have attacked suspected enemy positions. We have indicated our intention to protect other contingents in the multinational force, some of which have suffered larger casualties than our own. Moreover, we have left open the possibility of extending our protective umbrella to the Lebanese Army. And, with the deployment of the carrier Eisenhower, the assult ship Tarawa with 2,000 marines on board, and the battleship New Jersey, we are clearly anticipating the possibility of mounting larger combat operations.

In view of this situation, there is not question that if American troops are to remain in Lebanon, their deployment should be in accordance with the war powers resolution. If this act were invoked, the President would have to report to Congress within 48 hours on the circumstances necessitating the introduction of U.S. forces, the estimated scope and duration of the hostilities and the role of American troops. This report would provide the information Congress needs if we are to make an informed judgment on the probable costs and risks of keeping our Armed Forces in Lebanon. In addition, the act would require regular consultations between the executive and legislative branches. These consultations would put Congress in a position to decide whether the terms of the deployment should be modified or whether and by what date the troops should be withdrawn. Without this information, Congress can only either defer blindly to executive decree or make critical decisions without the benefit of reviewing all relevant facts available to the Commander in Chief.

There has been a great deal of discussion about whether the war powers resolution is constitutional and whether it is an infringement of the President's prerogatives as Commander in Chief.

Mr. President, I for one am not a constitutional scholar. But I do know that when my constituents elected me to the Senate they certainly did not expect me and my colleagues to give the President a blank check on matters of war and peace. On the contrary, they expected me—and all the elected representatives of the American people—to help our Nation decide what causes are worth risking death for. Not to be involved in making these decisions would, for me, be an abrogation of my responsibilities as a Senator.

As I see it, that is what the War Powers Act is all about and why we should invoke it today. The conflict in Lebanon is precisely the kind of situation envisioned by the authors of the act. It is precisely the kind of situation that requires joint decisionmaking.

I do not believe the Congress should try to manage combat operations from Washington. That is the job of the generals and admirals on the scene. Nor do I believe we should impose our view of the diplomacy on the Secretary of State. But we should—indeed we must—be full partners in the decisions on when and for what reasons to continue deploying U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon. We should not pretend that the marines' original mission has not changed over the past 12 months. They were initially sent to Lebanon to oversee the withdrawal of the Palestinian forces. They they were reintroduced to protest civilians after the refugee camp massacres and to allow the Lebanese Army to stabilize the countryside. It now appears that their purpose is to reinforce President Gemayal's government, protect the multinational force and secure the removal of all foreign forces in the belief that they can thereby guarantee Lebanon's independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity. But the marines' presence also makes them hostage to changing security conditions there.

The United States and our friends in the Middle East all have some stake in a peaceful, stable Lebanon. But we should have no illusions about how difficult it will be to secure a durable peace. Indeed it may simply not be possible. So before authorizing American forces to remain for any significant time, we owe it to ourselves, as well as to those who will be depending on our commitment, to reconsider whether that goal is attainable and at what cost. And we must think through at the outset how and by what date we and the other participants will end our involvement should Lebanon's national reconciliation fail.

Only by fully involving Congress in the resolution of these threshhold questions about what is our national interest in Lebanon; whether there is a threat to that interest, what is our specific mission and what are the probabilities of success for that mission under pessimistic and optimistic scenarios. Only after involving Congress in answering these questions first can America hope to avoid the divisive recriminations that could follow if hostilities escalate and casualties mount.

Moreover, since circumstances will change if the fighting resumes or spreads, Congress must be a partner in reassessing whether our interests are served by prolonging our role in the hostilities and if not how best to end our involvement.

The resolution before us does not allow for this kind of partnership. Moreover, it does not even commit the President to only 18 months nor circumscribe the scope of our involvement. The administration has made it abundantly clear that they do not consider themselves bound by the Baker-Percy resolution and that they intend to exercise independent judgment with respect to both the terms and duration of our forces' presence in Lebanon. Just last weekend Secretary Shultz not only reiterated that the troops will stay until all foreign forces Syrian, Israeli, and Palestinian have withdrawn from Lebanon, but then he also envisioned our troops moving out into Lebanon to assume wider responsibilities such as guarding the Damascus/Beirut highway and stopping the reintroduction of foreign troops once they have left.

Mr. President, I cannot in good conscience put my name to a blank check—especially where the lives of American soldiers and ultimately the national prestige and strategic credibility of the American people are on the line. And therefore I will vote against this resolution.

It is unfortunate that the President has chosen to make our overt military involvement in the international conflicts within Lebanon an occasion for challenging the War Power Act's constitutionality. Had he not done so, he could probably have counted on solid, bipartisan support for a continuing American peacekeeping mission in Lebanon. Not necessarily for 18 months, but for long enough to see more clearly whether our presence can help reunite that country and establish the foundation for political reform and national unity.

As it is, by insisting on limiting Congress' role to acquiesence in an open-ended commitment, the administration has made the goal of a stable and peaceful Lebanon all the more elusive.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, it surprises me that the administration is so confused about the applicability of the war powers resolution to the stationing of American marines in Lebanon. Under section 4(a) of the war powers resolution, the President is required to report to Congress within 48 hours if U.S. Armed Forces are introduced into hostilities or situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances.

Now, it seems to me that there is little doubt in the minds of the vast majority of Americans or, I would guess, in the minds of the majority of my colleagues, that the U.S. Marines entered a situation where imminent involvement in hostilities was clearly indicated when they arrived in Lebanon on September 25, 1982, after the assassination of the President-elect of Lebanon and the massacres at Shatila and Sabra. Certainly, all doubt about the nature of the marines' role in Lebanon was erased on August 28 and 29 of this year, when the marines were fired upon and two were killed. At this point 4 marines have been killed and more than 30 have been wounded. And still, the President has not seen fit to comply with the War Powers Resolution.

My strong suspicion is that the President, like the three Presidents preceding him, does not like the War Powers Resolution and does not believe that it should be the law of the land. Nevertheless, it is the law and he is obligated to comply with it. I supported the Byrd amendment to the resolution we are debating here today, because I believe that it is in keeping with the spirit and letter of the war powers resolution. I believe that the President was required by law to submit by August 31, 1983, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate, a report which included detailed information about the situation in Lebanon and the rationale for sending our forces into Lebanon. The President did not submit this report.

The Byrd amendment would have required the President to submit this report not later than 48 hours after the enactment of the resolution. After the submission of this report, section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution would be triggered. This would allow the President 60 additional days to keep the troops in Lebanon without congressional authorization. But after these 60 days, the Congress would be obligated to review in detail the situation in Lebanon and could at that point require the President to bring the marines home.

As written, the resolution we have debated for the past 4 days in essence excuses the President from his requirements under law. It authorizes the President to keep U.S. forces in Lebanon without any justification from the President regarding the purpose for the troops being there. It provides an extension for the stationing of U.S. forces in Lebanon that far exceeds the 60 days provided by the war powers resolution. And, although the President would have to report to Congress every 3 months, Congress would not be obliged to vote on the reauthorization of the deployment of troops after receiving these reports.

During these 4 days of debate, I have seen no reason for excusing the Reagan administration from the requirements of the War Powers Act. Indeed, I believe the law gives structure to the relationship between the Congress and the President regarding the use of our Nation's war-making powers as this relationship was envisioned by the Constitution. Although I personally opposed the original decision to deploy troops in Lebanon, I know that my colleagues and I would have been very willing to review the reports required of the President and to consider the deployment on the merits of the arguments presented therein.

Regrettably, action taken in this Chamber today and in the other body yesterday has not modified the resolution to make it more in keeping with what is already the law of the land. I cannot vote for this resolution as it stands because it does not impose requirements on the President's use of our forces in Lebanon in keeping with the War Powers Act. I am greatly saddened by the President's refusal to comply with the law, and I am gravely concerned at the effect that the precedent of this resolution will have on the ability of the Congress to exercise its power to oversee the Executive's use of our Armed Forces in foreign lands.

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, the deaths of five U.S. marines in Beirut have caused many in Congress to question continued American involvement in the multinational peacekeeping force. Although I continue to support a very short-term U.S. involvement in that effort as a responsibility incumbent upon us in our pursuit of a just and lasting peace in the Middle East, I am concerned that the Congress have a constructive voice in basic decisions affecting continued engagement in Lebanon. Moreover, the President's policy will gain international stature if it is backed by strong support from the people's representatives.

The Congress has the proper vehicle for playing such a roll on these fundamental questions of war and peace. That vehicle is the War Powers Resolution.

The War Powers Resolution is the centerpiece of congressional attempts to resurrect the authority of the legislative branch in the wake of excesses associated with Executive warmaking. The resolution was not written in a vacuum, it was not an attempt to usurp Presidential power—it is a reaction to the major foreign policy events of the past 35 years. Certainly a lesson of our searing experience in Southeast Asia must be that the Executive should not be able to commit the Nation to war without a declaration of war or specific congressional authorization. The War Powers Resolution is not only a symbol of congressional determination to assert its legal role—it also represents an effective deterrent to unilateral warmaking by the President.

The aim of the War Powers Resolution and its specific provisions—reporting, consultation, congressional authorization for long-term hostilities—is not to penalize the President. It is rather to allow the branches to work together on the question of sending American troops into foreign hostilities. In the words of the resolution:

> It is the purpose of this joint resolution to fulfill the intent of the Framers of the Constitution and insure that the collective judgement of both the Congress and the President will apply to the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into hostilities.

The framers of our Constitution wanted the people's representatives to share important decisions on foreign policy with the Executive. For this reason, article I, section 8 of the Constitution gives Congress the power to declare war. Certainly, the Constitution divides authority over these issues between the branches. The President does need flexibility in responding to emergencies and fulfilling the powers of Commander in Chief. But the President does not have the sole power to commit our Nation to war. Congress must act soon to assert its role with regard to our involvement in Lebanon, or events might quickly overtake us. To do anything less is to be negligent of our constitutional responsibilities.

The War Powers Resolution is clearly not being observed with respect to American participation in the multinational force in Lebanon. According to provision (5)(b) of the resolution, Congress must authorize the use of Armed Forces personnel beyond a 60-day period "in situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated."

It makes a mockery of the law to suggest—as does the administration—that our forces are not engaged in hostilities. Our naval ships bombard enemy artillery positions, our Air Force flies over Beirut to demonstrate resolve—these signs and more indicate that the role of our marines in Beirut has clearly changed since their introduction over 1 year ago. It is time for the President to admit that we are engaged in hostilities and seek congressional authorization for such involvement consistent with the war powers resolution.

The Byrd substitute set the war powers clock ticking. It represented an attempt to get the administration on record as recognizing that the war powers resolution applies to our involvement in Lebanon. I supported this amendment and am disappointed that it failed to pass this body. Its passage would have forced the President to comply with the law. More importantly, the Byrd amendment represented an opportunity for the Congress—as the people's representatives—to strengthen the President's hand through its strong show of support. A consensus on our involvement in Lebanon will not be truly achieved until the President invokes the war powers resolution and abides by its provisions. Only then can it be said that the Congress has authorized our participation in the multinational force.

Mr. President, the United States is becoming more and more involved, and the people's representatives should have a say in that involvement. We need a national consensus on our participation in Lebanon, and the War Powers Resolution is the most efficacious means of achieving it—but not one that gives the President a free hand for the next 1½ years. We must build congressional support and forge national consensus on this issue. We must work in the true spirit of compromise legislation. Without this national consensus—foreign governments will be tempted to use domestic discard as a means of testing our will and resolve.●

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I support the resolution of the Senate to authorize with certain limitations the continued participation of U.S. Armed Forces in the multinational peacekeeping forces in Lebanon. I am pleased that the President will be providing indepth, periodic reports on the crisis in Lebanon. The ultimate purpose of this resolution should be to help create an environment which sustains a democratic and free Lebanon, with secure borders and protected sovereignty.

I applaud the administration's work in urging a cease-fire in Lebanon, a nation suffering a profound national crisis which involves distinctly international implications. The movement of Israel forces southward seems to have unleashed a new reign of terror. The tempo of violence has picked up recently, urged on by the Syrians, who have consolidated their forces, the PLO, which has crept back in recent months, and the Druze forces, which have been bolstered by continued Soviet bloc and radical Arab support. Intelligence reports suggest that the original Israel invasion may well have averted a catastrophic military confrontation in the Middle East. The mountains of Soviet bloc military materials discovered in every section of Lebanon prove the PLO, Syrians, and Druze intended to launch a massive military action. Sadly, the temporary respite gained for a short time after the removal of some PLO forces from Beirut now has faded. Again we appear to be at the brink of a crucial stage in Lebanon and Congress is intricately involved because of the applicability of the War Powers Act.

I have expressed concern about the presence of U.S. combat troops in Lebanon since we were formally invited to send forces to oversee the departure of the PLO in August 1982. The international tensions and the importance of Lebanon to so many nations have long convinced me that a broad-based multinational force for peacekeeping will more effectively limit military confrontations. The decision to join with Italy and France on September 20, 1982, in forming a peacekeeping force did not, in my opinion, involve enough interested nations in the delicate process of peace. Again, the United States appears to be bearing an inordinate amount of the responsibility for lessening tensions in the region. As critical as the situation in Lebanon appears to be, Congress must complete its responsibilities in appropriately applying the War Powers Act. Congressional action, far from being subversive of constitutional authorities, is essential in situations like Lebanon, where the best that can often be hoped for is a temporary cessation of violence; where open warfare threatening the whole region is dangerously possible at any moment.

After reviewing the War Powers Act in the context of the Lebanese crisis, I am convinced that the dangers of the situation demand that Congress and the President carefully follow all procedures mandated: when the President "commits U.S. Armed Forces equipped for combat to the territory, airspace or waters of a foreign nation * * * and when the President "commits U.S. Armed Forces to hostilities outside the territory of the United States, its possessions and territories," under the War Powers Act. The debate over the extent to which the President must follow the reporting requirements of the act often revolves around the issues of: whether the conflict is hostility or imminently hostile as defined by the act and whether or not the peacekeeping role can be construed as combat. Setting aside for the moment the tragic fact that four marines have died from wounds received while carrying out their duties, it appears clear to me that hostilities under the act encompass: First, actual fighting, and second, a state of confrontation where no shots have been fired but where there exists a clear and present danger of armed conflict. "Imminent hostilities" denotes a situation in which there is a clear potential either for such a state of confrontation or for actual armed conflict. Under the definitions detailed in the Report on the War Powers Resolution of 1973, the decision to commit U.S. Armed Forces to the peacekeeping force should have set in motion active congressional involvement in the decision regarding the extent and character of U.S. military commitment. The result would undoubtedly have been establishment of the peacekeeping force, just as it exists today. However, the tenuousness of the Lebanese crisis should have alerted Congress to its responsibilities.

I would prefer a more extensive multinational force which involves more nations than the United States, Italy, and France. In retrospect, I also believe the War Powers Act should have been fully implemented, providing a stronger foundation for the troop commitment. The present resolution resolves some of the difficulties which have not been squarely faced, but I will stress that it appears to me that such cooperative action between the administration and Congress should have occurred at the earliest states of our military commitment. There should of course not be any negative connotations connected with congressional involvement. Congress should be as profoundly interested in the peace process in Lebanon as the executive branch. These partners in foreign policy, the executive and legislative branches, must view the crisis in Lebanon as a serious geopolitical confrontation with intricate Soviet involvement. Thus, we must act under the War Powers Act with care—but indeed we must act, carefully monitoring the progress of the peacekeeping process and always urging the participation of more nations in the force, or better yet, a U.N. Peacekeeping Force.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I support the resolution submitted by my colleagues, Senators BAKER and PERCY on the U.S. Marine presence in Lebanon as both a fulfillment of the War Powers Act and as an expression of support for our efforts to bring peace and stability to Lebanon.

In 1970, following the invasion of Cambodia by American troops, I cosponsored with Senator Javits an early version of the War Powers Act. I supported the final version of that act in 1973 and, believing the act to be constitutional and in the best interests of this country, voted to override the President's veto. Believing as I do in the principles embodied in that act and the procedural safeguards it includes, I see little merit and less to be gained haggling over who must act first for the War Powers Act to be invoked. What is at issue is whether Congress, recognizing the situation, concurs and supports the actions undertaken. I do.

It is in our interest and that of our allies and friends that Lebanon survive and survive independent of outside pressures and internal violence. To proclaim that as a policy is not enough though. Despite the desire of most Lebanese to live in peace and security, to get about the business of rebuilding their homes, their economy and their nation, other forces sought for their own reasons to continue the bloodshed, to disrupt the rebuilding and to insure that a Lebanese Government would never truly exist. It must be made clear to those who would destroy Lebanon, to those who have never recognized its existence in the first place and to those who for personal gain would participate in its destruction that we, the United States and our allies, will not tolerate that.

Time and conditions had to be created for Lebanon to rebuild itself, to heal its wounds and to build the strength—economic as well as military—to survive on its own. That, in essence, is why the multinational force was created, and why we agreed to participate.

The wisdom of that decision is evident in the cease-fire and the attempts at national reconciliation now underway. None of us here can predict how long that cease-fire will hold. The track record in Lebanon is not good. It may break down and have to be resurrected several times before it holds.

But the will to make it work is there, and I believe our presence and those of three of our NATO allies has measurably helped to create the conditions for its ultimate survival.

I would note here that we are not the multinational force. We are not even the largest component of force. The peacekeeping force, composed not only of our marines but of forces from three of our closest allies—France, Italy, and the United Kingdom—reflects in its very composition the concern and the commitment of the free world to the survival of Lebanon and to the importance of a free Lebanon to shared strategic and political interests in the region:

The territorial integrity of Lebanon directly affects the security of Israel's northern border.

The independence of Lebanon is a factor in the defense of the east Mediterranean.

The stability of Lebanon contributes directly to our efforts to avoid another Israel-Arab conflagration and to secure a lasting peace for all states in the region.

There is also the clearly humanitarian need for the peacekeeping forces, and their American component, to remain in Lebanon. Until the Lebanese Government has reconstituted itself sufficiently to extend its control and protection over all its citizens, to be accepted by all Lebanese as a rightfully representative government, and recognized and respected by its neighbors as a sovereign state, the potential exists for communal and ethnic animosities to flare once again, and again with tragic results.

We cannot solve Lebanon's problems ourselves. The peacekeeping forces cannot and should not mediate between the warring factions. That must be done by the Lebanese themselves and through active diplomacy. What the MNF can and has done is create the opportunity for those political processes to work.

It may take 1 week, 1 month or 1 year for the process to complete itself. It cannot be predicted either by the administration or the Lebanese, nor can it be legislated by Congress. The 18 months provided for in this resolution allows the breathing space, and the sense of commitment, to see this process through. We pray that it is more than enough time. In that case, the resolution allows for the termination of our participation, as it allows for an end to our role if either the United Nations or the Lebanese themselves are able to assume the mantle of responsibility. And, for those who are concerned that it may not be enough time, the President has confirmed that he will seek a mutually acceptable agreement with Congress, just as he has this time.

And, with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, reflecting the international character of the force, should the situation change and we find ourselves alone in the peacekeeping role, our participation will cease.

This resolution thus is clearly not a blank check. Should the mandate of the MNF be unclear to some of my colleagues, should the distinction between policy goals and mission objections appear fuzzy, I believe the safeguards built into this resolution and the assurances we have received from the White House on its understanding of its responsibilities should allay those concerns.

I would urge my colleagues to look beyond the legalisms and, commensurate with our duties and obligations to this country and to our national interests as laid down in the Constitution and as representatives of the people of this country, to recognize the vital interests involved, to give this resolution their serious consideration, and to support it fully.

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I would like to vote to authorize the marines to stay in Lebanon as part of a multinational force for a reasonably limited time under limited conditions and for limited purposes. But all efforts in the Senate to work out a reasonable time and to clarify the conditions of the stay of the marines have been beaten back on sharply divided partisan votes.

The merits of some of the efforts were clear. In some instances, they were not even debated—just beaten down.

The refusal to consider any changes to meet the legitimate and broadly felt concerns about the overly long 18-month life of the authority being given the President and the overly broad and open-ended military mission definition in the resolution causes me to vote no.

Rarely has there been such partisan cleavage on a foreign policy and defense matter in my few years in the Senate. Usually we try to accommodate broadly based concerns of the Members if those concerns do not compromise the thrust or the principle of the legislation.

Unrelentingly, these concerns have been ignored. What we are left with is an overly long and overly broad resolution of authority.

Our marines will stay in Lebanon even if we defeat this resolution. The President has made that clear because he denies the constitutionality of the War Powers Act.

It should be our goal to help the Lebanese Army gain control of the embattled land. Lebanon is the crossroads of an east-west and north-south conflict. It deserves a respite from the role of victim. It needs our help. We should not be precipitously withdrawing our marines. But, under the War Powers Act, we must, as a Congress, become involved in the approval process once hostilities begin.

If Senators are involved, it must be more than rubber-stamping a deal fashioned by others, as much as we may personally admire the people who fashioned the deal.●

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, the resolution we are here debating invokes the War Powers Act on our actions in Lebanon, but the larger question is, How long are the 1,400 U.S. marines to stay there and to what extent do we tacitly leave it to the President to decide how much more of our land, air and sea forces will be committed in Lebanon if he believes additional forces are needed?

U.S. foreign policy should be bipartisan and carried out by the President. Emergency military action for our national interest that require prompt decisions for emergency action is properly under the President's command. Hostile actions that endanger our Embassy in Beirut have been correctly defended by our military and naval forces.

At the time, I objected to committing U.S. forces to the multinational peacekeeping force because our involvement invites more opposition from Moslem groups in Lebanon than would the troops of another country not linked as closely as we are to Israel. There are other valid objections also, including the obvious one that from a military standpoint this small U.S. force can be overwhelmed by much larger armed groups should their hostile action be centered on our marines.

The cease-fire is evidence of our diligent efforts and our influence with Saudi Arabia has brought them into the negotiations as the key mediators with Syria and other Arab nations. That is essential for any long lasting peace in Lebanon.

In 1981, I supported the President in the AWAC sale to Saudi Arabia, because I believed it would strongly back and enhance the peaceful mediation of Saudi Arabia in the Middle East disputes. None of these defensive aircraft has yet been delivered to Saudi Arabia, but their influence in the Arab world has been the linch pin in the current fragile Lebanon cease-fire.

To stabilize Lebanon so a coalition of the divergent fueding sects will work together in a new government will require patience and time.

I do not support the President's policy of direct U.S. military involvement in Lebanon with our marines. I shall not vote for this resolution.

I do support a replacement of them by a similar contingent from another country not as involved as we are with Israel.

Today there are more than 125,000 heavily armed troops in Lebanon, which is a country of only 4,000 square miles, about one-thirtieth the size of my own State of Montana.

The Lebanese Government has 14,000 soldiers in tactical units plus another 10,000 in support units.

The Phalangist Militia claims a standing militia of 10,000 plus about 15,000 reservists. They control much of the ground east of Beirut and the coastal sections north of the capital, as well as mountainous areas in north and south Lebanon.

The Druze claim a militia of 4,000 fighters, concentrated in the Chouf (shōf) Mountains.

The Amal Militia is made up of Shiite Muslims and has somewhat less than 10,000 trained troops.

The Mourabitoun are the militia of the Sunnite Muslims and is comprised of about 5,000 militiamen, heavily armed with Soviet equipment.

The Syrians have between 25,000 and 35,000 troops in the Bekaa Valley, also supplied by the Soviets.

About 6,000 Palestinian troops remain in Lebanon.

There are also 12,000 Israeli troops still in Lebanon.

Obviously, the presence of U.S. marines as a part of the peacekeeping force is symbolic of our intense concern. This is not sound military strategy that would be recommended by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The U.S. marines reflect our determination to back the Lebanese Army and Government. This symbolism of U.S. marines and naval forces in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Lebanon warns all sides that the United States may commit a much greater striking force.

Neither 1,400 marines in Lebanon, nor many more, are going to settle the conflicts which exist among the Lebanese Christians, the Lebanese Muslims, the Syrians, the Palestinians, and the Israelis. These conflicts stem from ancient religious antagonisms and feuds which began centuries ago and are not likely to be resolved within a period of days or months.

I have prepared a synopsis of the history of conflicts in these lands now called Lebanon which follows at the end of my statement of the current situation.

Lebanon's latest nightmare began recently after Israel withdrew its forces from the Chouf (shōf) Mountains southeast of Beirut to safer positions farther south. The Druze and Christian Phalangist militias immediately engaged each other for control of the abandoned territory. The Druze, who have dominated the Chouf area backed by Soviet-built tanks supplied by Syria, drove the Phalangists down the mountains toward the Beirut-Damascus Highway. It has been a part of this struggle that the U.S. marines and the other elements of the peacekeeping force have come under direct fire.

The history of these conflicts now causes everyone who is Moslem to line up with the other Moslems and everyone who is non-Moslem to line up on the other side. We would like to think that the presence of U.S. troops will serve as a buffer to keep peace between the factions. I believe, however, that our reputation as a strong supporter and ally of Israel makes it impossible for us to effectively mediate between the opposing forces.

We should also give some thought to the function that the U.S. marines were intended to serve in Lebanon. They were first sent to Beirut to supervise the evacuation of the Palestine Liberation Organization fighters from that city. The President then announced on September 20, 1982, that he was again returning the marines to Lebanon for a limited period of time with the mission of enabling the Lebanese Government to assume full sovereignty over its capital. It was not fully explained how the marines' presence would serve to accomplish that goal, however. In fact, the role of the peacekeeping force in settling the conflict was not clear from the outset.

We should never have been in Lebanon to begin with. Now that the troops are there, and have been there for a little over a year, some people are arguing that once we have committed ourselves we cannot leave until we finish the task at hand. I would argue that the longer U.S. Armed Forces stay over there, the harder it will be to disengage those troops.

The resolution before us would limit the stay of the marines to 18 months; 18 months is far too long a period of time considering that, once the War Powers Act has been invoked, the designated time describes a limited period of time for disengaging troops. If we fail to set any time limit, however, I am concerned that our failure to set a deadline for withdrawal could be used in support of keeping the troops there for an indefinite period of time. I feel that they should be pulled out as soon as is logistically possible, within 60 or 90 days, while arrangements are made to substitute for these troops the troops of other countries which are perceived as being more neutral.

BRIEF HISTORY

To fully understand the difficult problems existing in Lebanon we must look at the origins of the conflict.

Lebanon's people comprise ancestry such as Phoenician, Greek, Byzantine, Crusader, and Arab. While the dominant strain in the mountains is related to the Armenians of Asia Minor and the Caucusus, inhabitants of the coastal towns are descended from inhabitants of Syria, Palestine, and Arabia.

Arabic has survived as the national language, although French and English are widely spoken in official and commercial circles.

The most distinctive feature of Lebanon's social structure is its religious composition. The population of Lebanon is almost equally divided between Christians and Muslims. Of the Christians, the Maronites comprise nearly 30 percent of the entire Lebanese population. In descending order of size, other Christian groups are Greek Orthodox, Greek Catholic, Armenian Orthodox, Armenian Catholics, Protestants, Syrian Catholics, Latin Catholics, Syrian Orthodox, and Chaldeans (kal-dee-ans).

Lebanon's three non-Christian religious groups are the Sunnis (Orthodox Muslims), the Shiites (non-Orthodox Muslims), and the Druze, an offshoot of the Shiites. The Sunnis make up almost 20 percent of the total population, the Shiites 17 percent, and the Druze about 6 percent.

The coastal areas of what is now the State of Lebanon were settled as early as 3,000 years before the birth of Christ by Phoenician sailor/traders. They controlled major areas of what is now Lebanon through their port cities of Tyre, Sidon, Byblos, and Beirut until the Romans invaded the region and exerted control in 60 B.C.

With the conquest of Syria-Lebanon by Muslim Arabs between A.D. 634 and A.D. 640, the mountain regions of Lebanon began to figure in politics. Toward the end of the 7th century, the Maronites, a Christian sect persecuted in their Syrian homeland, began to settle in the northern part of the Lebanese mountains. By the 11th century, northern Lebanon had become the seat of the Maronite patriarch. About 1180, the Maronites entered communion with Rome.

Meanwhile, dissident Muslims had penetrated southern Lebanon, where they formed the Druze community in the early 11th century. Taking advantage of their impregnable position in the Lebanese mountains, the Druze developed a tight feudal organization that became the nucleus for the subsequent political development in Lebanon.

In 1517, Lebanon became part of the far-flung Ottoman Empire. The Turkish control over Lebanon was never very tight. During the period under Turkish control, the Druze were the leading political element in Lebanon and were opposed to the Turks. Following Druze support for an unsuccessful attempt by Egypt to drive the Turks from Lebanon-Syria, the Druze chief was driven from Lebanon.

This was followed by a period of civil war between the Maronites and the Druze. The French backed the Maronites and the British backed the Druze. The Turks also played the Christians against the Muslims in a divide-and-control philosophy.

Following the massacre of Maronites in 1860, the major European powers stepped in and set up an autonomous Lebanon with an administrative council made up of representatives of the various religious groups.

Following World War I, Lebanon was assigned to France as a League of Nations mandate. In 1926, greater Lebanon became a republic, though still under French control. When France fell to Germany, Lebanon surrendered to the allies in 1941 and was declared independent by the Free French Government.

The Christian and Muslim leaders in Lebanon reached an unwritten accord called the National Pact. Under the National Pact, the president was always to be a Maronite Christian who was elected by the Chamber of Deputies for a nonrenewable 6-year term. The president appoints a cabinet and premier who is a Sunnite Muslim. They are responsible to the Chamber of Deputies, headed by a Shiite Muslim.

The National Pact began to unravel with the rise of Nasser to power in Egypt in 1954. Nasser put Arab unity ahead of national unity. Armed insurrection broke out against the Lebanese Government in 1958. The United States eventually intervened at the government's request in July 1958.

Following the crisis, the Lebanese Government followed a course of appeasement of Egypt. This upset many Christians who had become military leaders over the years. A more and more serious division grew between the Christians and the Muslims, now bolstered by the Palestinian guerrillas. Open fighting broke about in 1975.

Several attempts were made by the government to put the National Pact back together. It failed, and things deteriorated to the point where Syrian troops entered Lebanon in 1976 to keep the peace. Shortly afterward, all Americans were evacuated from Beirut.

The latest round of fighting began on March 14, 1978, when Israel sent 20,000 to 30,000 troops across its northern border into southern Lebanon. Unlike other Israel incursions into southern Lebanon, the Israeli forces in March 1978 occupied the whole southern Lebanon region. This initiated a new round of fighting in Lebanon which continues even today and served to shake up and change the political and military alinement of the various groups in Lebanon.

The approximately 30 ethnic, religious, and political groups were originally polarized into two camps by the 1976 civil war. The Christian right camp is led by the Phalangists, who are primarily Maronite Christians—conservative, capitalist, and nationalist.

Opposing the Christian right is the national movement, a Muslim left coalition headed by Druze leader Walid Junblatt.

The Syrian Army intervened in Lebanon in April 1976 to protect the Phalangists, then fighting alone against the Muslim leftists and Palestinians. But in February 1978, the Phalangists joined with a Lebanese Army unit in an attack on Syrian troops in Lebanon. Since then, the Syrians and Phalangists have been rivals.

The most recent series of Syrian-Phalangist clashes began in January 1981. As a result of this fighting, the Syrians have pulled back to the Beirut-Damascus road in the Bekaa Valley, but since that time have forcefully resisted further expansion by the Phalangist Militia and Lebanese Army because they view the Bekaa Valley running northeast from Israel as an Israeli invasion route to Syria. The Syrians have dug in and are resisting all efforts to convince them to evacuate Lebanese territory.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, in the recorded history of mankind, our Nation is among a handful of nations, governed by laws, which are based on the consent of the people. Our relations are guided by and based upon the law.

As you know, Mr. President, the provisions of the Constitution relating to national defense are:

Article 1, Section 8: "The Congress shall have the power . . . to declare war . . . to raise and support Armies . . . and to provide and maintain a Navy . . . .

Article 2, Section 2: "The President shall be the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy of the United States . . ."

Thus the powers related to the security of our Nation are divided between the President's constitution responsibility as Commander-in-Chief to wage war and the judgment responsibility of the Congress to declare it, having provided the funds to support a military establishment. In situations requiring the presence and participation of elements of U.S. military forces, where Congress has not declared war, Congress then must exercise its responsibility through power "over the purse" and provide, or withhold, funds required to support military operations. With the passage of the War Powers Act, Congress codified its interpretation of constitutional provisions relating to foreign military operations. This interpretation has been consistently rejected by every President.

Americans have always distrusted unchecked and undivided power. That is why those who framed the Constitution imposed on our Government a unique system of checks and balances.

As a nation, we have discovered, on numerous occasions in our history, most recently in Vietman, that the respective powers of the Congress and the President are ill-defined in situations short of a declaration of war. To fill that gap, and to extend the logic of the Constitution in these gray areas, Congress passed the war powers resolution in 1973.

The purpose of the War Powers Resolution is to fulfill the intent of the framers of our Constitution to insure that the collective judgment of both the President and the Congress will apply to the introduction of the U.S. Armed Forces into hostilities.

Mr. President, I will not dwell on the technicalities of the war powers resolution, as that topic has been exhaustively explored by other Senators in the course of this debate.

Mr. President, I call on President Reagan to bring the question of the War Powers Act before our highest court to determine its constitutionality and resolve the ambiguity which has existed since its enactment.

I intend to support the resolution before us now because I believe that it will give the United States the greatest opportunity for a positive conclusion to our country's effort in Lebanon.

While there may be a question as to the constitutionality of this act, there can be no reasonable doubt that the multinational forces have been engaged in hostilities in Lebanon and that the act applies. By this resolution, Congress is acting under the act, the law of the land, until the Supreme Court may decide otherwise.

The current situation, and particularly the safety of our forces, requires we act now under the law.

A vital part of this debate is whether our objectives in Lebanon are achievable and, if so, at what cost.

President Reagan outlined the objectives of our forces last year as follows:

First. A cessation of Syrian, PLO, and Israeli hostilities;

Second. A secure northern border for Israel;

Third. The reestablishment of a strong Central Government of Lebanon, which could secure sovereign control of Lebanese territory; and Fourth. The departure of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

The first of these objectives, the cessation of Israeli and Syrian hostilities, has been achieved. The Multinational Forces of the United States, France, Italy, and Great Britian, together with the heroic efforts of Ambassadors Phillip Habib, Richard Fairbanks, and William MacFarlane, have accomplished this objective.

Likewise, the second objective regarding the security of the northern border of Israel has improved.

But, Mr. President, I have serious doubts as to our ability to accomplish the remaining objectives.

The ability to achieve the balance of these objectives is beyond the ability of man to predict today. At most, we can unite, hopefully, in a bipartisan manner behind the President, who has given Congress written assurances that he would:

> Seek Congressional authorization—as contemplated by the Act . . . if circumstances require any substantial expansion in the number and role of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon.

Mr. President, the resolution of the distinguished majority leader is a compromise that is the product of extensive negotiations involving the President, his administration, the leadership of the House of Representatives, and the leadership of the Senate.

Having had some personal involvement myself in three wars, I have the utmost compassion and concern for the welfare and safety of those who proudly wear the uniform of America's Armed Forces.

It has always been by hope that the United States would not have to commit military personnel into the Lebanese situation. But that decison was made 1 year ago; they are there and need our support. The President needs bipartisan support from Congress.

Hopefully, our Nation will join so that our united strength will show America's resolve to restore peace in Lebanon and enable the earliest possible withdrawal of U.S. forces.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, Senate Joint Resolution 159 represents a compromise negotiated by the leaders of the Congress and the President of the United States. Testimony to bipartisan credentials are demonstrated by the support it has received from a Republican President, Ronald Reagan, and Democratic Speaker of the House, "TIP" O'NEILL. It recognizes both the President's right to conduct the foreign policy of this Nation and the right of the Congress to carefully evaluate and approve the commitment of U.S. troops to areas of the world where hostilities clearly exist.

In my judgment, this resolution carefully circumscribes our role and commitments in Lebanon. It does not, as some would suggest, provide the President with the authority to commit the United States to a deeper and more dangerous involvement in Lebanon. Indeed, we have learned much from our experience with the Gulf of Tonkin resolution. Our debate and the specifics of this resolution show that we have not forgotten the lessons of our involvement in Vietnam. Of particular importance is the fact that the President has agreed that the involvement of U.S. marines in Lebanon will be limited to the carefully defined peacekeeping mission of the multinational force. Equally significant, the President has made it clear that the number and role of the U.S. marines in Lebanon will not be altered without congressional authorization, as specified in section 4(a) of the Lebanese Emergency Assistance Act, Public Law 98-43. That provision categorically states: "The President shall obtain statutory authority from the Congress with respect to any substantial expansion in the number or role in Lebanon of United States Armed Forces." In addition, the President has made it clear that he will not commit the use of U.S. marines in Lebanon beyond the 18-month period authorized by this resolution without consulting the Congress.

Mr. President, there is no doubt that achieving peace in Lebanon will be very difficult. The ability to achieve a long lasting political solution will depend on denying radical forces on all sides the ability to disrupt the peace process. The continuation of hostilities will make the creation of a government which is truly representative of all the people of Lebanon impossible.

The dependable presence of the multinational force at this time has been in major part directly responsible for the negotiated cease-fire which currently exist in Lebanon. The tenacity of that force, particularly exhibited by the U.S. Marines, has no doubt made it clear to the Syrians that they cannot satisfy unjustified, far reaching territorial arms in Lebanon by violent means.

Now is not the time to undermine the fragile peace which exists in Lebanon. It is not appropriate to shorten the proposed 18-month authorization for continued United States participation in the multilateral peacekeeping force in Lebanon. Such action to shorten the time period might well tempt others to make mischief. We would be well advised to avoid giving other forces that opportunity.

This resolution preserves the right of the Congress to authorize the commitment of troops into hostile regions. It preserves the right of the President to conduct the foreign relations of this Nation. It further protects this Nation against an unwise and unnecessary escalation in U.S. military activity in Lebanon. In doing so, it offers the most responsible means available to us for resolving the pitfalls and legalistic complexities posed at this time by the War Powers Act. But it is not a substitute for a sound and farsighted U.S. policy in Lebanon and the Middle East. At best it will help provide the time for a peaceful solution to be found and give Americans every possible assurance that our Government will not imprudently take steps that might irrevocably commit us to an unwise path.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I should like to offer several observations respecting the resolution which has been introduced by the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to authorize continued U.S. participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

While there has been much learned in the Senate regarding the details of the War Powers Act and its applicability to the current situation in Lebanon, I should like to address my remarks to the first finding stated in the joint resolution before us:

> The Congress finds that . . . the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East.

I repeat this:

> The Congress finds that . . . the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East.

Mr. President, the thrust of my argument today will be that this congressional declaration is fundamentally at odds with the proposition set forth by Walter Lippmann in his classic study, "U.S. Foreign Policy: Shield of the Republic." This was published in 1943, in the middle of the Second World War. The title page contains a line from George Washington's 1796 Farewell Address, which is read here every February on the anniversary of his birth. Washington wrote of the moment—

> When we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

It is the fundamental thesis of Walter Lippmann's book that the controlling principle of foreign policy must be that the Nation maintain its commitments and its power in equilibrium.

Lippmann wrote of:

> The compelling and, once seen, the self-evident common principle of all genuine foreign policy—the principle that alone can force decisions, can settle controversy, and can induce agreement. This is the principle that in foreign relations, as in all other relations, a policy has been formed only when commitments and power have been brought into balance. This is the forgotten principle.

Lippmann wrote in 1943, though it is as true in 1983—

> Which must be recovered and restored to the first place in American thought if the nation is to achieve the foreign policy which it so desperately wants. . . . a foreign policy consists in bringing into balance, with a comfortable surplus of power in reserve, the nation's commitments and the nation's power.

My purpose this afternoon is to state that if the Senate should vote to adopt the resolution before us, an eventuality that seems quite probable, we shall be acting completely contrary to Lippmann's wise dictum. We will assert an objective in foreign policy that it is quite beyond our power to attain. Disequilibrium shall accordingly be the result, marked by turmoil, setbacks, even defeat—though that defeat may be postponed by deeper engagement and wider commitment of our Armed Forces.

To declare as essential what cannot be achieved is to insure failure.

It is astonishing to think that the White House would have sponsored this proposal, that a President—any President—could have agreed to sign this resolution. Yet, though one may be dismayed, one cannot act surprised. As I have said before, there is a leakage of reality in this administration that somehow seems impossible to overcome.

Were Congress and the President to find that it was desirable to have all foreign forces removed from Lebanon, or were we to state that we hoped they would leave, even that we would try to help them leave, then I would support that as a reasonable expression of American purpose and intent. But to establish this as an essential objective of American foreign policy is to embark upon a vast expansion of our commitment in Lebanon, indefinite and unlimited.

Consider for a moment what the United States will be saying with this resolution. We are saying that the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is the essential U.S. foreign policy objective. That means, in the first and most specific instance, that the Syrian Army must evacuate Lebanon.

In what reasonable circumstances could we contemplate that happening?

Mr. President, there is only one circumstance, and that is in the event a U.S. expeditionary force of some considerable size were sent to Lebanon to drive the Syrian Army to the borders of Syria.

Having attained the initial condition of this essential objective in U.S. foreign policy, how would we then maintain that condition? Only by leaving our expeditionary force on the borders of Syria indefinitely: For the moment we departed the Syrian Army would reappear, and our essential foreign policy objective would once again have failed of attainment.

There is a history here known to most Members of the Senate but perhaps not widely known in the country. It is a history of an obscure segment of the Ottoman Empire, and the mandates of the treaties of peace that followed the First World War.

The first thing to know, and I think the most important thing to know, it is that until September 1920, there never was a nation called Lebanon.

France, under the August 10, 1920 Treaty of Sevres that followed World War I, was assigned a portion of the Ottoman Empire as a mandatory power. Much as the British were to divide their nearby mandate in the area into the states of Palestine and Trans-Jordan, and the like, the French proceeded to create two new states in their mandate. The borders of the modern nations of Lebanon and Syria were drawn by functionaries in some department at the Quay D'Orsay.

In 1941, the Free French commander, General Catroux, formally declared Lebanon a sovereign independent nation. In 1943, a national pact organized the Government along confessional lines according to the 1932 census, the last one taken in that country, which seemed to give a majority to the Christian Maronite community.

It is important to note that the Government in Syria did not then, and has never since recognized the existence of a country called Lebanon. They have never exchanged ambassadors. Successive Syrian rulers have viewed Lebanon as simply part of a greater Syria with its capital in Damascus.

Note also that there had never been, until after the First World War, a country called Syria. Far back in biblical history there was a country we know as Assyria, and there is a Syrian culture and a Syrian people, much as there is a Levantine people. But a country with borders and constitutions and flags and great seals called Syria, no.

Like several of its neighbors, Syria is also one of the results of the League of Nations mandatory arrangements that followed the defeat of the Ottoman Empire in the First World War. Its independence came after the fall of France in the early part of the Second World War. Ironically, upon attaining its independence in 1946, Syria asserted an imperial claim of its own to the land and people of Lebanon. Through the decades of the 1940's, 1950's, and 1960's, Syria sought to assume control over Lebanon, variously through diplomatic overtures of subversion and overthrow of the Government of Lebanon.

In 1975, in an open, unabashed act of aggression, Syria invaded Lebanon, which until that time had maintained a precarious peace among its many different elements although by then the internal peace was in fact breaking down.

The West chose at the time to do nothing about this. I can report that I was then the American Ambassador to the United Nations. We knew the Syrians, armed by the Soviets, were moving in. We knew that the Soviets were providing significant amounts of aid to leftist forces through the Lebanese Communist Party.

The Lebanese Ambassador, a good man of great personal qualities, Edouard Ghorra, asked to see me. He said:

> My country is being invaded by the Syrians. Is there any hope of American help?

This conversation took place at the United Nations, where a clear violation of the charter was being observed almost daily on television and on the front pages of New York's newspapers.

Ghorra asked if there was any hope of American help. I had to say to him that there was none, that the United States and the West—this was in the administration of President Ford—would do nothing. And nothing was done.

I was not speaking on instructions from Washington. I was speaking from my understanding of the political atmosphere in our Capital and those of Europe. The next administration, that of President Carter, did nothing either.

Finally, as Syrian power extended down into the Bekaa Valley, as an extraordinary emplacement of PLO forces located themselves above the Litani River, there came a time when the Soviets had so militarized that region that it posed a clear and direct threat to the security of Israel. The Israelis responded as they have done before when attacked, and the situation we now see came into being.

Having watched Lebanon be ravaged from within and without by Syrian forces relying on the Soviets, over 8 years, we now suddenly decide in September 1983 the United States should do everything. At the moment of the invasion, when the crime was committed, we did nothing, said nothing, proposed nothing, expected nothing from anybody else.

I recall the French—and I do not mean to be derisory—sent their former prime minister, Pierre Mendes-France for a 2-day inspection tour 8 years ago. He returned to Paris and said there was nothing to be done.

We did as much at the time. Today we find ourselves declaring that undoing the events of 1975 has become an essential American foreign policy objective.

Are these serious persons who drafted this resolution? Had they ever heard Walter Lippmann's thesis, that a nation's commitments must be in equilibrium with its power?

Mr. President, we do not have the power to do what this resolution promises we shall do. We could gather together forces from around the globe and drive the Syrians back across their border, abandoning other strategic positions which should be protected. But this would require our forces to remain at that Syrian border indefinitely, because the moment we departed the Syrian Army would come right back into Lebanon and our essential U.S. foreign policy objective would be undone.

Ask what this means, this abrogation of a fundamental principle of sound foreign policy—that one's commitments must be in equilibrium with one's power.

After 8 years of absolute inaction; never asking the French to do anything serious—they were the mandatory power—never making clear to the Syrians that there would be costs to them for their policies; never asking the Saudis to influence the Syrians whom they finance—what was a matter of indifference has become essential to American objectives.

Mr. President, I spoke earlier of a leakage of reality in the present administration. I believe that with great conviction. Time and again, one observes its highest officials making commitments they are in no way able to keep and then, upon learning of their inability, reversing themselves and American policy.

We have had a more than normally interesting experience here in the Senate and in the country within the past few days. Last week a deputy representative at the United Nations—who, one learns today, had already offered his resignation from the post—invited the members of the United Nations to leave the United States if they chose, and he offered some rather colorful language which has led some to observe that the State Department still seems to have not found out that the sun sets in the West. He as much as invited 156 members of the United Nations to sail off into the sunset, which of course would be toward Jersey City.

When the President, upon reflection, endorsed the suggestion that the United Nations think about leaving the United States, this aroused a great feeling of patriotism among the Members of this body. By the end of the day on which the President's remark was carried in the press, last Thursday, the Senate had voted overwhelmingly to cut our contribution to the United Nations in half. We showed those Reds. And then we showed them more—for the amendment we adopted, by vote of 66 to 23, went on to stipulate that if this unilateral action was not formally accepted by the United Nations we would cut off our contribution completely.

Mr. President, 20 years ago there was one institution in the world that wanted the United Nations out of the United States, and that was the John Birch Society. It has since been joined by the Government of the Soviet Union.

It would be my view that we should cooperate with neither.

Only in the dawn's early light did we recognize that if we did this we would soon lose our right to vote in the General Assembly.

Our having lost our right to vote, there would in very short order materialize an effort to have the United Nations depart from the United States, presumably to Vienna, where the Soviets would most like it to be.

We have violated a fundamental commitment made to the United Nations, which is to negotiate, as does every other nation, what we will contribute. This is done in the Fifth Committee of the General Assembly. We can negotiate a reduction in our contribution—and probably should—but we cannot simply declare it. That is what the Soviets do.

Shortly after the Senate vote, on this past Sunday, the President was obliged to declare his dismay that the Senate had followed his lead. One imagines all manner of officials at the White House having suddenly seen the light and saying to each other, "O Lord, what have we done this time!"

The President expressed this dismay to the Secretary General of the United Nations on Sunday.

Yesterday morning, Mr. President, we learned that George P. Shultz, our distinguished Secretary of State, a man who has won the respect of every Member of this Senate, is pursuing his difficult duties in New York, at the United Nations. With his counterparts from Britain, France, and Italy, Secretary Shultz is investigating whether we could not get the United Nations to contribute to the peacekeeping forces in Lebanon.

The same United Nations the administration had just told to sail off into the sunset, and the same United Nations for which, to show those Reds, the Senate had just voted to cut off every penny. This same United Nations found Secretary Shultz in its midst, hoping to secure the assistance of the United Nations in Lebanon. The Secretary of State's work has been rendered unnecessarily more difficult by the inclination of others in his administration to say what they cannot mean.

They do not seem to understand that, for good or ill, they won the last election. They are required now to govern.

Another illustration of the leakage of reality also occurred this week.

The President very much desires that we increase the funds available to the International Monetary Fund. This of course is to deal with a world financial crisis occasioned in large part by the economic policies of this administration. Having made a career of speeches against international globaloney, the President now recognizes that this country needs an international monetary system. We need it more than anyone.

Yet just 2 months ago the National Republican Committee was raising money for Republican candidates for the House of Representatives by accusing Democrats—Democrats who had helped the President defeat an amendment that would have immobilized the IMF—of supporting communism.

My very good friend, Representative DAVID OBEY of Wisconsin, has been very blunt on the meaning of this. He has said, in effect, "Mr. President, if you want this legislation passed, you owe an apology"—not personally, not in any undignified way, but simply to say the Republican campaign committee's position was wrong and does not represent the policy of the administration.

Note that yesterday morning on the front page of the New York Times a headline reports "Reagan Praises IMF and Warns Congress Over Delays in New Aid." The President is trying to fix the problem his supporters have caused the United States. Soon he will be coming here asking the Senate to reverse the action we took on Thursday night. He will have to. And I suppose we will do it. In the end we have to be responsible. After all it was we who acted the other night.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I state that the same thing will happen if we adopt a resolution declaring it to be an essential U.S. foreign policy objective that we bring about a military solution in Lebanon which we have not got the capacity to bring about. We will have to change our policy to comport with reality.

There has not been a wiser proposition set forward about American foreign policy than that offered by Walter Lippmann in 1943. This was the time America was beginning to realize it was going to have to have a foreign policy. The absence of one had brought Pearl Harbor to us. The absence of one had caused us to send our armies over the whole of the globe; The great fighting of the Second World War was about to begin in the summer of 1943.

Lippmann wrote:

> Without the controlling principle that the nation must mantain its objectives and its power in equilibrium, its purposes within its means and its means equal to its purposes, its commitments related to its resources and its resources adequate to its commitments, it is impossible to think at all about foreign affairs. Yet the history of our acts and of our declarations in the past fifty years will show that rarely, and never consistently, have American statesmen and the American people been guided by this elementary principle of practical life.

I propose, Mr. President, that the resolution before us will bring about disequilibrium and worse. And, as much as I regret to say this to the distinguished authors of the resolution, I propose to vote against it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as I stated 2 weeks ago, the situation in Lebanon is an example of what the authors of the War Powers Resolution had in mind in 1973 when the resolution was enacted. Hostilities exist and American troops have been introduced into those hostilities.

The War Powers Resolution now before the Senate requires the President to report to the Congress when such a situation occurs and further mandates that his report be specific. The resolution requires, among other things, that the President state the mission of the deployed U.S. forces. It says that he must estimate the scope and duration of the hostilities or involvement, and shall provide whatever other information the Congress needs to fulfill its constitutional responsibilities.

The President of the United States has failed to obey this important law. In so failing, he is, in my judgment, subjecting himself and his Office to valid criticism, and he is placing in jeopardy the policy which he has failed to effectively present, but for which he seeks congressional concurrence.

One of the primary purposes of the War Powers Resolution was to reassert the constitutional right of Congress to commit U.S. forces to conflicts. In the absence of a clear statement of mission by our President, it will be extremely difficult to maintain support for his policy. All across this Nation, citizens are asking for an explanation as to why our men are in Lebanon.

This is a reasonable question which deserves—indeed, demands—an answer. Not only is the President of the United States the individual who should provide the answer, he is the single person in this Nation who can command the audience which the answer deserves.

In an effort to prompt the President to define for the American public and the Congress the exact mission of the U.S. forces now positioned in Lebanon, Senator BYRD offered an amendment, supported by me, which would have required the President to provide a complete war powers report to the Congress. That amendment failed. The question then became: In the absence of a Presidential declaration of mission, should the Senate provide continued authority for the U.S. troop presence?

Clearly, a majority of both the House and Senate perceive dangers in a precipitous withdrawal of the U.S. troops from Lebanon. I am among that group. As I stated 15 days ago, the United States has substantial interests in the region and should pursue those interests. I believe that those interests outweigh the need perceived by many of my colleagues to resolve the 10-year-old conflict between the legislative and executive branches over the President's reporting responsibilities under the war powers resolution.

A number of my colleagues have also suggested that in the absence of a clear statement of mission, the length of time for which authority is granted should have been reduced from 18 to 6 months. The amendment which encompassed this proposal reflects a fundamental deficiency in our debate. This deficiency is that we are focusing on time periods rather than policy objectives. Senator BIDEN, in the Foreign Relations Committee, correctly emphasized that the length of time is really a secondary concern. What is relevant are U.S. interests, the tools available to accomplish U.S. goals, and the criteria by which, at some point in the future, we can judge whether or not our poicy goals make sense and if our efforts to achieve these goals have been successful.

Unfortunately, what we are using is the wrong standard of measurement; it is as though we were using a ruler to measure someone's weight.

I hope and pray, as I know all Americans do, that our marines will be withdrawn before 18 months have passed. it should be noted that this resolution does not preclude an early withdrawal; it merely establishes 18 months as the maximum time the marines can remain in Lebanon without further authorization by Congress.

Having disparaged this debate's emphasis on time limitations, I must, for the RECORD, note my belief that a 6-month authorization is unwise. In my view such a "short leash" would have two immediate effects: First, it could result in the more intense targeting of the U.S. troops. The adversaries of the Lebanese Government know enough about our system to realize that public opinion affects legislative debate; they would certainly attempt to influence that debate by influencing public opinion. The comments of the Marine Commandant, Gen. Paul X. Kelly, before the Committee on Foreign Relations are relevant to this point. He emphasized that a shorter time period could result in increased fire on the marines. He stated:

> I am concerned that we would encourage hostile forces or forces inimical to the best interests, the life and limb of marines. It would encourage them to be more provocative in an attempt to arouse public sentiment.

Second, I believe that the 6-month authorization would provide Syria with a disincentive to reject violence and seek its objectives in Lebanon through negotiations.

Although the issue is imperfectly before us, due to the President's failure to state clearly his policy and objectives in Lebanon, and although we are using the wrong standard of measurement, it is nonetheless before us. My support for the resolution is based upon my belief that its failure could lead to disastrous results in Lebanon—not only for the marines but for the people of Lebanon and of this country.

Renewed fighting in Lebanon, a Syrian-PLO takeover of that tormented land, a new Syrian-Israeli war are surely possible if not likely should this resolution fail. These events would pose a severe threat to the stability of the entire Middle East, including the oil-rich Persian Gulf. Tragically, we remain highly dependent—and our European allies and Japan even more so—on that supply of oil.

Finally, I emphasize that this Congress decision to provide authority for the continued presence of United States forces in Lebanon should not be considered an open-ended commitment or "blank check" from which Congress cannot back away, should circumstances warrant such a course of action. As the President stated in his letter to Senator PERCY of September 27:

> I can assure you that if our forces are needed beyond the 18-month period, it would be my intention to work together with the Congress with a view toward taking action on mutually acceptable terms.

Indeed Congress will continue to have a say in our troop deployment policy. Moreover, should the legislative and executive branches disagree on our Lebanon policy, Congress may still assert itself through the appropriations process.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, in considering this resolution, I have had a serious concern that, in effect, it could amount to a "declaration of war by implication" and that it delegated to the President the power to make war without Congress exercising its exclusive constitutional power to declare war. The resolution was vague and unclear as to the mission of the U.S. forces. Rather than defining the U.S. mission, the resolution merely incorporated by reference the statement of mission contained in the exchange of letters on September 25, 1982, between Presidents Reagan and Gemayel, which were drafted under circumstances far more secure for American forces than the circumstances of the past month in which our forces were shelled by artillery and fired back. During weeks of such exchanges, for the first time five American marines were killed and many more were wounded.

What was particularly unclear in the Statement of Mission cited above were the limitations governing use of American air and naval support. It was also uncertain whether the authorized role for the marines extended beyond self-defense and included defending the Lebanese Army from attack or even assisting the Lebanese Army regain control of any territories in the Beirut area from hostile Lebanese Militias.

Accordingly, on September 27, I made a floor statement setting forth my concerns. Following that, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the distinguished Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) and I engaged in a colloquy in which I sought clear assurances that the role of the U.S. forces was "peacekeeping" and not warmaking.

In our colloquy on the Senate floor on September 27, the Senator from Illinois acknowledged that the exchange of fire in recent weeks amounted to war.

I have been satisfied by the explanations of the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee that the resolution was neither intended to nor could be fairly interpreted to expand the mission of United States forces in Lebanon. On this basis, I concluded that the Congress was not delegating its duties to the President and allowing the President alone to initiate hostilities or make war without a prior authorization or declaration of war by the Congress.

In essence, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee stated that the role of our forces was interposition, not combat and use of firepower would be limited to self-defense.

Such a definition would preclude any possible interpretation of President Reagan's letter of September 25, 1982, as authorizing our forces to fight to assist the Lebanese Army to secure Lebanese territory.

In view of the chairman's clarification and limitation of mission in our exchange, I thought it would have been preferable to agree to the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) to strike the language in subparagraph 2 of the findings and purpose section, implying that the multinational peacekeeping force was established "in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory."

I understand, however, that the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee did not do so because of an agreement involving the Speaker of the House.

The shortness of time precluded modifying this language because a final vote was scheduled under the timetable required by the War Powers Resolution at 2 p.m., which was less than 2 hours later.

As the RECORD shows, two colloquies on this issue with the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee established clear assurances that the mission of the marines was not combat. In a long answer to my question, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee specified that the marines were not authorized to fight on behalf of the Lebanese Army and its territorial objectives. The use of its own firepower and that of supporting air and naval forces was limited to defending members of the multinational force against attack.

From these colloquies, there is agreement on behalf of the President and the stated legislative intent that:

First, the 1,400 marines in Lebanon would not conduct offensive combat operations;

Second, the 2,000 marines offshore would be used only to defend the 1,400 marines onshore;

Third, the naval air and sea power would not be used except to defend the marines onshore.

Once possible misinterpretations of the U.S. marines mission was avoided by assurances from Senator PERCY and Executive officials I concluded I should support the resolution.

A DERELICTION OF CONGRESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I strongly oppose the joint resolution on Lebanon sponsored by Senators Baker and Percy. In my judgment, its enactment would constitute: First, a dereliction of congressional responsibility to uphold the principles and procedures of the war powers resolution of 1973; Second, a failure to require of the administration a clearly articulated and persuasive statement of the mission which U.S. marines have been deployed in Lebanon to implement; and Third, an 18-month blank check under which the administration could pursue hitherto unspecified military objectives in Lebanon while asserting that it is operating with full congressional sanction. These gravely serious flaws warrant elaboration:

First, dereliction of congressional responsibility relating to the War Powers Resolution. The Baker-Percy language has been presented as a bipartisan compromise which, in the interest of avoiding a dispute over legalisms, would allow Congress and the Executive to affirm principles which are in conflict. This would present, it is argued, a united front regarding U.S. policy in Lebanon.

I do not believe that the issues surrounding proper implementation of the War Powers Resolution are mere legalisms. At issue are constitutional questions of immense gravity. The War Powers Resolution is law, a law passed over President Nixon's veto by overwhelming majorities in both Houses. The reservations expressed by the executive branch about the resolution's constitutionality do not diminish or compromise its legal standing. In the absence of a Supreme Court ruling, only Congress can change or nullify that law. But by failing to demand adherence to obligations prescribed in the resolution, Congress would abdicate its reponsibility to uphold the law. In any event, Congress must not concede to the executive branch the contention that the war powers resolution is not binding in all of its particulars.

One approach, first proposed by Minority Leader BYRD and advocated in committee by Senator CRANSTON, would have limited any joint resolution to a simple declaration that key provisions of section 4(a) of the war powers resolution were triggered by hostilities in Lebanon on August 29, 1983, which resulted in the deaths of two marines. Enactment of such a resolution would not entail a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Lebanon. It would, however, achieve the essential result of affirming unmistakably the applicability of War Powers Resolution procedures, including the requirement for congressional authorization for the maintenance of U.S. forces in Lebanon beyond 60 to 90 days. Unfortunately, this proposal was defeated in committee by a vote of 9 to 7.

The determined unwillingness of the administration to recognize that the procedures stipulated by the war powers resolution are now in fact required became starkly evident during the Secretary of State's testimony before the committee. Under questioning on September 21 about the relationship between the Baker-Percy resolution and future U.S. actions in Lebanon, Secretary Shultz was assiduously careful to reserve for the Commander in Chief a full range of options—regarding the scope of operations, the number of U.S. forces, and the duration of the involvement—even in disregard if necessary of the war powers resolution framework the Baker-Percy resolution would purportedly impose on the U.S. presence there. Congress cannot ignore what this means. The administration is prepared to participate in a procedure which would give some appearance of creating a war powers resolution framework without really conceding that any such framework exists.

Not only is the War Powers Resolution the law; its applicability to the situation in Lebanon is manifest. Accordingly, I believe strongly that any resolution passed should allow no ambiguity as to whether the procedures set forth in the War Powers Resolution are required. By intentionally sidestepping the issue, the Baker-Percy resolution fails to meet that test.

Second, the absence of a clearly defined policy. The constitutional ambiguity of the Baker-Percy resolution is paralleled by an alarming vagueness concerning the mission of the U.S. forces whose presence in Lebanon the resolution would purport to authorize. One year ago, on August 25, 1982, when U.S. marines were first introduced into Lebanon, their mission was limited and precise: to provide a temporary buffer that would allow the evacuation from Lebanon of elements of the Palestine Liberation Organization within a specified period of time. Shortly thereafter, when the marines were reintroduced into Lebanon, they were deployed to perform, as part of a multinational force, the less precisely worded mission set forth in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters between the United States and Lebanese Governments. That agreement did, however, make clear that the U.S. military role would be confined to the Beirut area and would preclude involvement in combat.

While citing the September 25 agreement, the Baker-Percy resolution is drafted so as to be susceptible to an extremely broad—almost infinitely elastic—interpretation of the mission associated with the presence of the U.S. forces in Lebanon. The purposes cited in section 2 include "the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon" and the restoration of "full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory." Thus, over the period of 1 year, the stated mission of U.S. forces in Lebanon has expanded from a limited role, the feasibility of which Congress could evaluate, to a role too nebulous for Congress to evaluate and too far-reaching for U.S. miltiary forces alone possibly to accomplish. Consequently, the effect of the resolution is to provide congressional acquiescence in a policy involving American soldiers in a commitment the scope of which has yet to be defined even by its proponents.

A major advantage of the Byrd-Cranston proposal to invoke section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution is that it would require the administration to submit for congressional evaluation a clear statement of military mission. This the Baker-Percy resolution would not do. It is not an example of any Vietnam syndrome to find in that resolution a disturbing similarity to the Gulf of Tonkin resolution of 1964 which, being comparably vague and invoking the necessity of protecting American forces, was used by a different administration to assert that it possessed congressional support for an Indochina policy which proved to be one of everwidening involvement.

Third, an 18-month blank check. Since I take as serious the administration's patent unwillingness to be bound by the stipulations of the War Powers Resolution, the duration of the Baker-Percy authorization is technically a moot point. Practically, however, a shorter authorization would at least require that Congress face again the issues—constitutional and policy—which Congress faces now but which the Baker-Percy formulation would allow it negligently to defer. Accordingly, I proposed—but failed to succeed with—an amendment that would have substituted a 6-month authorization period, after which these issues would again necessarily be joined if U.S. forces remain in Lebanon. I reject the argument that a time period shorter than 18 months would endanger the lives of American soldiers by inviting hostile action against them intended to sway U.S. public opinion against a continued U.S. presence. If the administration had offered a clearly defined mission in Lebanon for the U.S. Armed Forces and had also acknowledged its legal obligations under the War Powers Resolution, such a limited authorization might be unnecessary. I regret that we did alter the Baker-Percy resolution so as to stipulate a duration short enough to require Congress to review soon the crucial questions surrounding the United States involvement in Lebanon. I must emphasize, however, that I believe in any case that to pass this resolution would represent a grave abdication of congressional responsibility. All efforts to improve this resolution having failed, it remains a deeply flawed piece of legislation, which I must oppose.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, this resolution is the product of long and difficult efforts by many dedicated people of strongly held views. It is a genuine compromise. Congress is not being asked to authorized the President to use military force to expel foreign forces from Lebanon, or to reoccupy those parts of Lebanon now controlled by non-Government elements, or to intervene on behalf of the Lebanese Government to suppress internal Lebanese factions. The resolution simply authorizes the President to continue the current role and mission of U.S. forces.

Mr. President, our distinguished colleague, Jacob Javits, is in the Senate dining room this afternoon. Jack Javits was the principal architect of the War Powers Resolution and deserves our enduring gratitude for insuring that we have the opportunity to have such a vote today as the Constitution intended.

As Senator EAGLETON said this morning, no President since the passage of the War Powers Resolution has liked it or wanted to do anything to concede its constitutionality. My colleague from Illinois, Senator DIXON, suggested the other day that President Reagan was hedging on the War Powers Resolution in his letter of August 30 because he said he was reporting "consistent with the War Powers Resolution," rather than reporting as required by the War Powers Resolution. Yet that phrase is identical to the phrase used by President Carter when he reported to Congress about the Iranian rescue mission.

Presidents have always resisted restrictions on their authority as Commander in Chief and have avoided having to accept the constitutionality of the War Powers Resolution. There is nothing new in that.

But what would be the alternative to the course of action we have undertaken here in this resolution?

Some have proposed that we should simply pass a resolution declaring that all the provisions of section 4 of the War Powers Resolution are triggered by the Lebanon operation. Then, presumably, we would sit and wait out the duration of the present 60-day period or a new 60-day period, and then take the President to court, arguing that he no longer had authority to keep U.S. forces in Lebanon. Assuming that the courts would take such a case, and assuming that we could win such a lawsuit, is that the posture we wish to assume? We would then be arguing in front of all the world that we oppose as a matter of law the continuation of an operation which most of us support as a matter of policy.

If, on the other hand, the President preempted such a resolution by sending up a report explicitly tied to section 4(a)(1) of the resolution, we would be right back where we are now—debating a resolution of specific authorization. We would really have accomplished nothing, since the President does not challenge the reporting provisions of this act. What he and his predecessors do not like is the requirement in 5(b) for an authorization.

Is it not more likely to strengthen the future operation of the War Powers Resolution to pass this authorization, reaffirming the procedures and requirements of that resolution, and getting a Presidential signature on it—no matter what statements he will make about its constitutionality? We cannot legislatively prohibit the President from having reservations about the War Powers Resolution. But we can collectively reaffirm its validity and its applicability and thereby assure that the next time around we will have a less difficult time reaffirming the clear intent of the Constitution.

As Senator Javits has said, both Congress and the President gain something in this compromise, but from our point of view in the Congress, it is on balance a step forward in maintaining the strength of the war powers resolution. I would argue that the alternative courses of action would be a step backward.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield the floor now so the minority leader may seek recognition.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, logic, conscience, and lessons of history have led each Senator on this side of the aisle to the decision that he takes on this monumental legislation. Never—not once—was a political argument offered on this issue, even within the confidential confines of five caucuses that we held on this subject.

The consensus that is evident from our votes on this issue is a consensus of conscience. It is a consensus based on a concern that the law be faithfully executed, that our sons and daughters have a clearly defined mission with a light at the end of the tunnel, and that that mission be achievable. I continue to hope that the administration will present to the American people and the Congress a clear plan which will minimize our use of military force in the region and provide us with an understanding as to how and when our troops will be removed from hostilities. To date they have failed to do so. Instead, they have offered us a conpromise. Mr. President, politics is the art of compromise. War is not.

Mr. President, just last week the White House announced that a resolution authorizing the continued participation of U.S. marines in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon had been worked out with key Members of the Congress. At the time of the announcement it was emphasized that the President would sign the resolution into law only in the form agreed upon in negotiations with the White House.

At the time of the announcement, I stated that I was uneasy over the 18-month time period authorized in the so-called compromise resolution. However, I emphasized that any final judgment I might make on this matter would await the administration's justification for requiring an 18-month authorization.

The administration testimony, and in particular, the appearance by Secretary of State George Shultz before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, raised more questions than it answered in my mind. Not only was the justification virtually nonexistent regarding the need to extend by 18 months the participation of the marines in the MNF in Lebanon, but also, and of more concern to me, this testimony revealed that the Congress might be going through a useless exercise. In other words, because of the continued assertion by the executive branch that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, should not, or could not, be bound by laws governing the introduction of U.S. forces into hostile situations abroad, Senate Joint Resolution 159 has been rendered nothing more than a useless piece of paper.

The Secretary's statements before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and his subsequent interview on Cable Network News have been addressed in great detail during the debate thus far. So I will not replow old ground by recapping what the administration spokesmen have argued quite strenously in opposition to any congressional role regarding the deployment of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon.

I think it has been made very clear by this administration that a U.S. military presence will be required in Lebanon for some time into the future. The U.S. Government is not any longer in the position of just participating in a multinational peacekeeping force until such time as the Government of Lebanon has been able to bring greater Beirut under its total control. The Government of the United States has committed itself to remaining in Lebanon until the withdrawal of all foreign forces, the achievement of national reconciliation, and until such time as the Government of Lebanon can exercise sovereign control over all of its territory. And the administration wants to continue that presence in Lebanon in the absence of any concerns on the part of the American people as expressed through their elected representatives in the Congress.

Mr. President, I have emphasized time and time again on this floor and directly to the President that the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into hostile situations abroad cannot be sustained in the absence of the support of the American people. Passage of the War Powers Resolution in 1973 over a Presidential veto signaled congressional determination that American interests were best served if there was a national consensus regarding the deployment of U.S. forces on foreign soil. Open-ended commitments of armed forces in the absence of support from the American people, as expressed through their 535 elected Representatives in the Congress, pose grave dangers for U.S. policy.

Now, administration spokesmen tell us that despite the War Powers Resolution, despite Senate Joint Resolution 159 in effect being a war powers authorization for the continued participation of U.S. marines in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon—despite these things—the President has a free hand to do what he alone determines to be in the national interests of this country.

In an effort to recoup some of the damage done through the public statements of the Secretary of State, the President on Tuesday of this week wrote the distinguished majority leader of the Senate, stating that he would abide by section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act. Section 4(a) stipulates that the President must obtain an authorization from the Congress to change the role and mission of our Armed Forces in Lebanon. As to the question of the congressional role under the War Powers Resolution, the President remained adamantly silent on this issue. He basically told the Congress that if there were a need to keep U.S. Marines in Lebanon beyond the 18 months provided for in Senate Joint Resolution 159, he would be prepared to negotiate another agreement, as long as the War Powers Resolution did not govern the outcome of that agreement.

Therefore, the handwriting should be clearly on the wall. With the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 159 and its companion bill in the House of Representatives, Congress is in effect giving the President his policy in Lebanon, whatever that policy might be, and an open-ended commitment of U.S. troops to that country. We are doing so because the administration has made it very clear that it will do whatever the President deems is necessary as Commander in Chief, despite what the law might say on this matter. Not only is the President ignoring the will and responsibilities of the Congress, but he also is thumbing his nose at the people of this country in matters of war and peace. He is stating that no matter what the elected Representatives of the people might say, he will deploy U.S. combat forces abroad, anywhere, in any numbers, with a minimum of justification because he is Commander in Chief.

I do not want to belabor this point for too long. But I do think the words of Abraham Lincoln when he was President are appropriate reminders of the seriousness of the situation before us. President Lincoln stated:

> The provision of the constitution giving the war making power to Congress was dictated, as I undertand it, by the following reasons. Kings had always been involving and impoverishing their people in wars, pretending generally, if not always, that the good of the people was the object. This, our Convention undertook to be the most oppressive of all Kingly oppressions; and they resolved to so frame the Constitution that no one man should hold the power of bringing this oppression upon us.

I want to underscore this observation with a slight paraphrase. President Lincoln was telling us that our Founding Fathers resolved that no one man should be vested with the power of bringing oppression upon the American people through the abuse of war making powers.

Mr. President, we are still a nation of laws and not of men. We still elect our Presidents, not crown them. Democracy is a very fragile form of government. But above all, our form of democracy, with its delicate checks and balances among the three branches of government, is even more vulnerable to dismantlement when abuses of authority go unchallenged.

The most serious and far-reaching decision any nation can make is to send its young men and women to fight and die in a foreign land. It is a decision that cannot be frivolous.

Mr. President, I commend the majority leader and the House leadership for their insuring that Senate Joint Resoluton 159 reflects the various provisions of the War Powers Resolution. And despite any expression of reservations by the President and any number of disavowals by the President's representatives, this will not alter the simple fact that without the expressed will of this body, and a majority in the other House, the President of the United States cannot act lawfully in the absence of congressional authority to continue our involvement in Lebanon for another 2 months.

I am confident that if the resolution were to pass, and if this administration, or a successor administration were to ignore its limitations, as the present Secretary of State has indicated they would, then they would do so at great peril. As all-too-recent history has shown us, no man, no matter what his rank, is above the law. Over 100 years ago, Mr. Justice David Davis, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, declared:

> The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protections all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government.

So while I am grateful to my colleagues for insisting that the War Powers Resolution is the law of the land, the compromise which is embodied in Senate Joint Resolution 159, includes an obligation which I am neither required, nor disposed, to fulfill. The acknowledgement—at least on paper—that there is a law on the books which must be obeyed, has been obtained in exchange for giving the President 18 more months to keep U.S. forces deployed in Lebanon in the absence of strong justifications. And I find it difficult to accept not only its terms, but also, in this case, the very concept itself. I repeat, Mr. President, politics is the art of compromise; war is not.

The decision to go to war or to send the youth of this country to die in foreign lands is the most awesome decision that any government is ever called upon to make. As a result, our Government must produce evidence of a preponderant nature to justify such a decision. That is why, almost two centuries ago, the Founding Fathers decided that this decision must be shared by the President and Congress alike. And that is why, 10 years ago, we enacted a law which breathed renewed life into that shared responsibility.

So, Mr. President, now we have the responsibility. Now we are called upon, by law, to exercise our judgment. History will judge us; history will judge the wisdom of the Founding Fathers; and history will judge the foresight of those of us who participated in the great debate in this Chamber a decade ago by examining how we acquit ourselves during moments such as these. On this, the first occasion of our invocation of the War Powers Resolution, let us not be found wanting—in our courage, in the strength of our convictions, or in the sincerity of our purpose.

We must ask ourselves what this constitutional struggle has really been all about. And once we have agreed that the purpose of the struggle has been to permit the people of this Nation, through their elected representatives, to be participants in this decision, then we must attempt to fulfill our obligations with all the diligence at our command.

Mr. President, the administration has not provided sufficient justification as to the national interests served by an open-ended commitment of U.S. combat forces in Lebanon. It has not provided preponderant evidence which would warrant risking the lives of American men and women in a foreign land. All Senators in this body must ask themselves one fundamental question. Can any of us explain to our children the compelling national interest at stake in Lebanon which would warrant their going to that country and sacrificing their own lives?

Do we have a right to expect less than a compelling case for those parents who have children in Lebanon today, or whose children may be sent to Lebanon in the future? I say the answer must be unequivocally no! We should not expect more from the American people when it comes to the possible sacrifice of their own flesh and blood, if we are not prepared to demand the same sacrifice from our own children.

Those parents back in our home States may be asking us, months from now, why their children had to die. They will be asking us what purpose was served, what goal was achieved, what vital national interest was at stake which required the sacrifice of young American lives. And our answers had better be a lot more meaningful than the mere assertion that the President wanted 18 more months.

Eighteen months! Why 18 months? Why not 6 months, 9 months, or a year? Nowhere in the record of administration testimony or public comments is there an adequate answer to that question. We have asked that question, over and over and over again. Yet, the only answer we get is that 18 months is the price we have to pay for the President of the United States to acknowledge that the war powers resolution is a Federal law.

For what purpose? Again we have asked in vain. And the mission? There is not any response to which I can ever point as justification for why our young people have been sent into a combat situation.

Do I point to the request for assistance by the Government of Lebanon in September 1982, when that Government asked for an "interpositional force" to be provided to facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area?

Do I point to the language of Senate Joint Resolution 159 which states that the purpose of our mission is "to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon?"

Do I point to the congressional finding in section 2 of this resolution which proclaims that the purpose is "to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory?"

Do I point to statements by the Secretary of State this past weekend that even after the withdrawal of all the foreign forces from Lebanon, our troops might be called upon to "occupy some (other) strategic positions in Lebanon?"

Do all these goals constitute the mission of the 1,600 U.S. marines presently on the ground in Lebanon? Or is it some of the above, or none of the above? I still do not have an answer to our baisc question. Why are they there, and what are they supposed to be doing? And the search for answers becomes complicated further by our awareness of what we see and what we hear. Our troops are positioned as sitting ducks around an airport. They have been shelled, injured, and killed. Is that their mission, to sit there and absorb shelling—to be caught in a crossfire?

Fortunately, a cease-fire is now in place. We all hope and pray that it will hold and that the killing will end. But we know how fragile it is. We know the history of that troubled land. We know the rivalries and the hatreds which have plagued that country for years and years.

And so now our young people sit, and wait, and hope, and pray, along with all of us that peace will take root in the Lebanese soil. But is that their mission now, to wait? For 18 months? And if the fighting breaks out again, is their task just to sit in the cross-fire, take more shelling, absorb more casualties, and just wait for the 18 months to run? Again, why 18 months? And again, the only answer we get is, "That's how it must be, because it was the only way we could get the administration to acknowledge that the war powers resolution is on the books."

Mr. President, that simply will not wash. For me to sign off on this agreement would be to make a mockery of the Constitution, the War Powers Resolution, and our responsibilities as Members of this body. We were not elected to send our young people off to foreign lands as bargaining chips in a high stakes game with another branch of our Government.

Politics is the art of compromise. War is not.

Mr. President, we are not haggling over a parochial institutional matter. We are demanding that there be a consensus in this country when we send our young men and women abroad to fight and die. We are demanding that the American people be fully supportive of our aims and goals when we make a decision as vital to the lives of our people as that of introducing U.S. Armed Forces into combat situations. We are demanding that the institutional checks and balances so laboriously constructed by our Founding Fathers to assure that this national consensus would prevail in matters of war and peace are not tossed aside in disregard of the people just because the President wants 18 more months.

Edward Hyde, a 17th century British historian and statesman who was the First Earl of Clarendon observed:

> The law is the standard and guardian of our liberty; it circumscribes and defends it; but to imagine liberty without a law is to imagine every man with his sword in his hand to destroy him, who is weaker than himself; and that would be no pleasant prospect to those who cry out most for liberty.

Thus, Mr. President, while I am supportive of the continued U.S. presence in Lebanon at this time, I just cannot give the President a blank check over some nebulous definition of our national interest in Lebanon. It is not the President's to have under the Constitution. It is not ours to give under the Constitution.

We have a compact with the people of this Nation and that compact is the Constitution. I am not prepared to rend the fabric of this compact by turning over to one man, whether he be the President, or a U.S. Senator, the sole responsibility for making war. The people of the United States, through their votes, invest in us a trust. That trust manifests itself in the instrumentalities of governance. And the singular instrument of governance is law—law which is promulgated for the common good. I will not violate this trust.

The War Powers Resolution is the law of the land. And as the English statesman William Pitt the Younger warned nearly 200 years ago: "When law ends, tyranny begins."

Mr. President, in light of these deeply felt concerns which I have expressed in my remarks, the administration has not left me any choice but to oppose Senate Joint Resolution 159.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I find myself in a unique position, for I was one of the 18 Members of this body who voted against the War Powers Resolution in the first instance. I find myself in a different position for another reason. I recall so clearly when the suggestion was first made that we should contribute American marines to a multinational force in the Middle East and I expressed my grave reservations and doubts about that action to the President and then publicly immediately after the first meeting on that subject in the Cabinet Room.

Mr. President, I still have grave doubts about the wisdom of American troops in the Middle East, but in my view that is not now the point. The point is the marines are there by the lawful acts of the Government of the United States. They are committed. They have a mission and a role. They are under fire. And I think it would be a mistake of tragic proportions if this Congress were to withdraw them, especially in the face of the first major bipartisan effort to enunciate and state a bipartisan foreign policy in this country in a long, long time.

I am as jealous of the prerogatives of the Congress in foreign policy as any person in this Chamber. I believe in the Congress. I believe in the inherent role of the Congress, and especially the Senate, in foreign policy matters. And I respect the War Powers Resolution because it is the law.

But, Mr. President, we have done something very precious here. We have bridged the gap of disagreement between the President, who did not wish to be the first to serve notice under the War Powers Resolution, and those of us who felt that as long as the act was on the record it should be invoked. In negotiations between the President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the minority leader of the House of Representatives, my office, and other Senators, including the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, this resolution was crafted and put together invoking the War Powers Resolution.

Mr. President, it would be tragic, in my view, to sacrifice that beginning first step toward the reinvigoration of a bipartisan foreign policy for this country. I hope the Senate will support this resolution.

Mr. President, in a moment the Senate will express its will on the joint resolution to authorize, in accordance with the War Powers Resolution, the participation of U.S. forces in the multinational force in Lebanon. It was passed overwhelmingly in the House and it is my hope that it will receive the same broad bipartisan support here in the Senate.

This resolution reaffirms as the policy of the United States an important national endeavor, Mr. President. As an element of our efforts to contribute to a comprehensive peace in the Middle East, the United States has committed its support to the Government of Lebanon as that Government seeks to reestablish its sovereignty throughout Lebanon and to obtain the withdrawal of all foreign forces—Syrian, Israeli, and Palestinian—from that beleaguered land.

In order to enhance the climate under which those goals can be achieved, the United States, Italy, France, and Great Britain have established a multinational peacekeeping force to provide stability in and around Beirut. In August, as a result of renewed violence in the region, four U.S. marines died and a number were wounded. Since then, others have been wounded. That is a tragic price to pay for trying to keep the peace. But, peace is far from certain in Lebanon today, and it is obvious that the possibility of continued hostilities exists. It is our responsibility, therefore, both imposed by the Constitution and assumed by law, to reaffirm a commitment that may, and in this case has, cost American lives. This resolution is pursuant to that responsibility.

For well over a month, Mr. President, there has been continuous consultation between the White House and the leadership of the Congress on the subject of this resolution. The goal of these discussions was to devise a strong expression of congressional support for our Nation's policies with respect to Lebanon, taking into account the requirements of the war powers resolution. I believe that goal was achieved and I remain hopeful that my colleagues on both sides of the aisle can join in support of this effort.

I believe it is absolutely imperative that we send the strongest possible signal to all the parties involved that the United States is committed to assisting the Government of Lebanon in its efforts to find a resolution of the conflict in Lebanon.

In that regard, Mr. President, there is now substantial reason to believe that our progress toward a reaffirmation of our commitment to achieving a settlement in Lebanon has already had a positive effect. As a result of the negotiations sustained by the United States and Saudi Arabia, the fighting in Lebanon has stopped and efforts are underway to convene a conference of national unity in which the leadership of all Lebanon's major factions will participate. There are no guarantees, either that the cease-fire will hold or that the conference will succeed, but it is a critically important first step.

I am convinced that the commitment of the United States to this process was essential to the achievement of this milestone. I would hope that we will now join with the House in reaffirming the commitment by enacting this statement of support for the policy and of authorization of our participation in the multinational force, which is so essential to the implementation of the policy.

From the beginning of the deployment of the multinational force in Lebanon, the administration, in consultation with the Congress, has carefully sought to emphasize the limits to our participation. We and the other members of the multinational force are there to provide a peacekeeping presence—a measure of stability in areas under control of the Government. That presence has proved useful in freeing elements of the Lebanese Armed Forces to allow them to expand the areas under Government control, and we have also provided valuable assistance and training to those forces. This limited mission is spelled out in letters exchanged between the Governments of Lebanon and the United States and those letters are incorporated by reference in this resolution of authorization.

Moreover, Mr. President, the size and scope of our participation is required to remain so limited by other provisions of law; namely, the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983. Since the introduction of this resolution, the President has reaffirmed his intent to comply with the strictures contained in that act and this resolution. My colleagues, therefore, should understand that this is by no means an open-ended authorization.

In the final analysis, we are attempting to enhance the prospects that the negotiating process will work. We should be under no illusion that this process will be easily concluded but at least it has begun. We should make every effort to strengthen the perception that we intend to see that process through to a successful conclusion.

I know that there are questions over which reasonable men and women might in good faith differ on the constitutionality of the war powers resolution. Until those questions are resolved, however, the war powers resolution is the law and it is entirely right and proper, and in fact our responsibility, to act in accordance with it. Without prejudicing anyone's right to argue the constitutional questions involved, this resolution and its companion measure in the House meet that responsibility.

The important thing now is to recognize that there are important national interests at stake in Lebanon, not the least of which is the safety and security of American marines stationed there as part of the multinational force. We owe them, the Government of Lebanon, and our negotiating team the strongest possible support and we should provide that support now while it still can be useful and while it appears already to be helpful.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any other Senator in the Chamber who desires to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 46, as follows:

So the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159), as amended, was passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159), with its preamble, reads as follows:

S.J. RES. 159

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This joint resolution may be cited as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East;

(2) in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory, the United States is currently participating in the multinational peacekeeping force (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon") which was established in accordance with the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982;

(3) the Multinational Force in Lebanon better enables the Government of Lebanon to establish its unity, independence, and territorial integrity;

(4) progress toward national political reconciliation in Lebanon is necessary; and

(5) United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon are now in hostilities requiring authorization of their continued presence under the War Powers Resolution.

(b) The Congress determines that the requirements of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution became operative on August 29, 1983. Consistent with section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, the purpose of this joint resolution is to authorize the continued participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

(c) The Congress intends this joint resolution to constitute the necessary specific statutory authorization under the War Powers Resolution for continued participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CONTINUED PARTICIPATION OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 3. The President is authorized, for purposes of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, to continue participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon, subject to the provisions of section 6 of this joint resolution. Such participation shall be limited to performance of the functions, and shall be subject to the limitations, specified in the agreement establishing the Multinational Force in Lebanon as set forth in the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982, except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to ensure the safety of the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS

SEC. 4. As required by section 4(c) of the War Powers Resolution, the President shall report periodically to the Congress with respect to the situation in Lebanon, but in no event shall he report less often than once every three months. In addition to providing the information required by that section on the status, scope, and duration of hostilities involving United States Armed Forces, such reports shall describe in detail—

(1) the activities being performed by the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(2) the present composition of the Multinational Force in Lebanon, including a description of the responsibilities and deployment of the armed forces of each participating country;

(3) the results of efforts to reduce and eventually eliminate the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(4) how continued United States participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is advancing United States foreign policy interests in the Middle East; and

(5) what progress has occurred toward national political reconciliation among all Lebanese groups.

STATEMENTS OF POLICY

SEC. 5. (a) The Congress declares that the participation of the armed forces of other countries in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is essential to maintain the international character of the peacekeeping function in Lebanon.

(b) The Congress believes that it should continue to be the policy of the United States to promote continuing discussions with Israel, Syria, and Lebanon with the objective of bringing about the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon and establishing an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area.

(c) It is the sense of the Congress that, not later than one year after the date of enactment of this joint resolution and at least once a year thereafter, the United States should discuss with the other members of the Security Council of the United Nations the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping force to assume the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon. An analysis of the implications of the response to such discussions for the continuation of the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be included in the reports required under paragraph (3) of section 4 of this resolution.

DURATION OF AUTHORIZATION FOR UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 6. The participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be authorized for purposes of the War Powers Resolution until the end of the eighteen-month period beginning on the date of enactment of this resolution unless the Congress extends such authorization, except that such authorization shall terminate sooner upon the occurrence of any one of the following:

(1) the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, unless the President determines and certifies to the Congress that continued United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is required after such withdrawal in order to accomplish the purposes specified in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters providing for the establishment of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(2) the assumption by the United Nations or the Government of Lebanon of the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(3) the implementation of other effective security arrangements in the area; or

(4) the withdrawal of all other countries from participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

INTERPRETATION OF THIS RESOLUTION

SEC. 7. (a) Nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the President from withdrawing United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon if circumstances warrant, and nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the Congress by joint resolution from directing such a withdrawal.

(b) Nothing in this joint resolution modifies, limits, or supersedes any provision of the War Powers Resolution or the requirement of section 4(a) of the Lebanon emergency Assistance Act of 1983, relating to congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon.

CONGRESSIONAL PRIORITY PROCEDURES FOR AMENDMENTS

SEC. 8. (a) Any joint resolution or bill introduced to amend or repeal this Act shall be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives or the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, as the case may be. Such joint resolution or bill shall be considered by such committee within fifteen calendar days and may be reported out, together with its recommendations, unless such House shall otherwise determine pursuant to its rules.

(b) Any joint resolution or bill so reported shall become the pending business of the House in question (in the case of the Senate the time for debate shall be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents) and shall be voted on within three calendar days thereafter, unless such House shall otherwise determine by the yeas and nays.

(c) Such a joint resolution or bill passed by one House shall be referred to the committee of the other House named in subsection (1) and shall be reported out by such committee together with its recommendations within fifteen calendar days and shall thereupon become the pending business of such House and shall be voted upon within three calendar days, unless such House shall otherwise determine by the yeas and nays.

(d) In the case of any disagreement between the two Houses of Congress with respect to a joint resolution or bill passed by both Houses, conferees shall be promptly appointed and the committee of conference shall make and file a report with respect to such joint resolution within six calendar days after the legislation is referred to the committee of conference. Notwithstanding any rule in either House concerning the printing of conference reports in the RECORD or concerning any delay in the consideration of such reports, such report shall be acted on by both Houses not later than six calendar days after the conference report is filed. In the event the conferees are unable to agree within forty-eight hours, they shall report back to their respective Houses in disagreement.

The title was amended so as to read "Joint resolution providing statutory authorization under the War Powers Resolution for continued United States participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.".

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. PERCY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I believe the business before the Senate should be the State authorization bill, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. HAWKINS). The majority leader is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, as I announced earlier, we have the continuing resolution here from the House of Representatives. It just arrived. Since the expiration of the fiscal year is tomorrow at midnight, I really think it is urgently important that we go directly to the continuing resolution.

I have apprised the majority leader of this, and I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 368.

Mr. BYRD and Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I know the Senator can get to it, but what I do not understand is why he is moving to go to it. He can do that. I would think he could get to it by unanimous consent, although that would involve the waiver of the 1-day rule.

But I cannot see all this business of going through an adjournment, which the majority leader can do and get to it, and which would take up a good bit of time, and he can still get to it.

As a matter of fact, I am concerned. I wish to see us go to it by unanimous consent, save that time, with the understanding clearly on the record that I want to see a vote on the Watt amendment, but I do not want to hold up the continuing resolution.

I do not want to hold up the extension of unemployment compensation. I do not want to hold up the King holiday measure.

I personally would give consent on my side, and others can object if they wish to, to proceeding to the continuing resolution, having the State Department authorization set aside, moving to the unemployment compensation measure, both of which have expiration deadlines of tomorrow night, with the State Department authorization set aside, and going to the King matter, with the authorization laid aside until then.

But I am just saying to my colleagues we can object if the majority leader proceeds to the continuing resolution, but he has the tools readily available to do what he wishes to in this regard.

I was just hoping he would not have to use them.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

May I say by way of explanation that I made the motion under the impression and I trust then it was a mistaken impression that there will be an objection to doing that.

I withdraw the motion, and I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 368, and before the Chair puts the request may I say that in making the motion I have no desire to prejudice the status of the State authorization bill.

The minority leader and I have discussed that matter and in this format it will recur as the unfinished business. I have no problem with that.

I do believe that we need to do the CR, the unemployment benefits, the King matter, and I would add to that the Labor-HHS appropriation bill which is available and one of the regular appropriations bills and will be up next week.

We may also have an emergency ag bill that may need to be taken care of.

But I am willing to cross those bridges as we come to them.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I think the majority leader will probably get an objection, but I hope he would not, but if he does, he can utilize certain rules which consume the time of the Senate and which would be most usefully spent on those items that have to be done by tomorrow night.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BRADLEY. Madam President, reserving the right to object, may I ask the majority leader a question concerning his intention on the Labor-HHS appropriations bill.

I have an amendment that deals with education that I was going to attach or attempt to attach to the continuing resolution, and I wondered if, as I understand the majority leader wants to move this and not delay the deliberations on all the other bills, that the minority leader referred to, but if I were to defer, would we get a vote on this education amendment on the Labor-HHS bill and would this occur the next week.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, let me answer the distinguished Senator from New Jersey in this way. It is the desire of the leadership on this side to go to the Labor-HHS appropriation next week. I cannot promise that, but it is one of the regular appropriations bills, and it is my full intention to do that after we take up the King holiday bill on Monday.

As to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, since I have not seen it, I do not know whether it qualifies or not as an amendment to an appropriations bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. I assure the Senator it does qualify.

Mr. BAKER. As far as I am concerned, I will make no effort to try to keep the Senator from offering his amendment which is not to say I would support it or I would not make a motion to table. I just do not know.

But the Senator certainly it appears to me will have an ample opportunity to offer the amendment to Labor-HHS since it apparently relates to the matter dealt with in Labor-HHS.

Let me also say to my friend from New Jersey that I hope Senators will withhold offering amendments to the CR as and when we get to the CR. I may be chief among those who had planned to offer an amendment to the continuing resolution. Indeed, I said to the Senate some weeks ago and announced publicly that I would not offer a funding amendment for the Clinch River Breeder Reactor until and unless there was a new financing program offered that I felt justified its continuation, and then I reserved the right to offer it to the CR, the continuing resolution.

But I am willing to forego that in the interest of trying to get a clean CR and get it out of here without amendments.

Now, for the benefit of the Senator from New Jersey and other Senators who may be listening, they should know that I have been assured by our colleagues in the House of Representatives, including the Speaker, and the ranking minority member of the Appropriations Committee, that they are going to get us a supplemental appropriations bill sometime next week.

So we are going to have the Labor-HHS bill, which seems to suit the purposes of the Senator from New Jersey. We will have a supplemental appropriations bill that may suit my purposes. And I am sure there will be ample opportunity for Members to offer their amendments to things other than the CR.

So, the long-winded answer to my friend from New Jersey, yes, I think he will have that opportunity.

Mr. BRADLEY. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Madam President, reserving the right to object—and if forced to, I will object, but I hope I do not have to object—I want to explain to the majority leader the posture in which the Senator from Ohio finds himself.

At the time the Interior appropriations bill was before the Senate, I offered an amendment, and the manager of the bill asked me to withhold moving forward on that. He had to be absent from the floor that day. He made a firm commitment that he would protect my right to offer the amendment and actually was sympathetic to the concerns I had expressed, and he would recognize my right to do so on the continuing resolution.

As a matter of fact, as I have attempted to explain informally to the majority leader during the day, I have been in discussions with the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, who also happened to be managing the Interior appropriations bill at that time. Senator HATFIELD had just informed me that the Forest Service, which is the arm of Government I have asked for the letter, is willing to provide that letter but feels it necessary that they discuss the subject with their legal counsel.

Under those circumstances, if I can obtain that letter—and it now appears that I will—and Senator HATFIELD supports me in that effort, I would have no objection to the unanimous-consent request with respect to the continuing resolution proceeding nor with respect to proceeding without any amendments. Under the circumstances, though, until I am certain that I am going to get the letter, the majority leader would force me into the position of using the various parliamentary procedures that are available. I am frank to say to the majority leader that on occasion I have found it necessary to follow that procedure, but I hope I will not be forced into that posture at the moment.

I wonder whether or not this matter could be set aside for an hour or thereabouts. I am not trying to delay the majority leader. I hope we will work it out, and I think I speak for Senator HATFIELD as well in indicating that fact.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator from Ohio. I have carried on a conversation with the Senator from Oregon as the Senator from Ohio was speaking, and I yield now to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, in response to the Senator from Ohio, as I had indicated to him informally, I think that within the next 5 minutes or so we can get a satisfactory response from the Forest Service. I see no reason why we could not proceed to take up the CR and dispose of it in a relatively short period of time.

This would then permit us to go to conference early in the morning with the House of Representatives and complete the conference early tomorrow, and get the report back to the floor, so that, for the first time in a number of years, we will not have to face the midnight hour or the possibility of shutting down the Government.

But we do need the cooperation at this point of every Member. The Senator from Ohio has been very cooperative in trying to work out this matter. I really feel that we can get him a satisfactory response very shortly—in fact, I hope in less than an hour—and I should like to get to the CR as soon as possible.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Madam President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I am wondering if the able majority leader could inform the Members of the Senate as to the schedule or the possibility of a schedule of a Senate session on Saturday.

Mr. BAKER. Before I reply to the Senator from West Virginia—and I will be most happy to reply—I think the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Oregon can work out their differences. They are awaiting a phone call or a letter. I should like to keep my request pending.

Therefore, in order to keep my request pending but to give us a little time to wait for a reply from the Forest Service, to see if the two Senators can work out their differences, I am inclined to put the Senate into a period for the transactions of routine morning business.

Mr. BYRD. What was the request?

Mr. BAKER. That we proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 368.

Mr. BYRD. Personally, I have no objection to waiving the 1-day rule. The Senator from Ohio is perfectly right. I have no objection to leaving the request pending.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend past 3:45 p.m., in which Senators may speak for 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

U.S. FORCES IN LEBANON RESOLUTION

Mr. RIEGLE addressed the Chair.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RIEGLE. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I hope this time will not be charged against the Senator.

Mr. President, on the vote that just occurred, I want to congratulate Mr. PELL and Mr. PERCY on their expert handling of a very difficult and contentious matter. They did it with great aplomb, and I know the Senate can be proud of the way both of those men managed and comanaged the resolution.

I should like to say again that there was no effort in my caucuses at any time—and we had five of them—to urge Senators to vote for or against the resolution. I, personally, never went to any Senator and asked him to vote for or against the resolution. We tried our best to improve the resolution that was before the Senate.

The amendment I offered on behalf of Mr. NUNN, Mr. CHILES, and others would have done that. It would have given the President an additional 60 days from the date of enactment. It would have allowed him to send to the Congress the report required by section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Act. It would have given the administration an additional opportunity to explain to the American people what the mission is, what the role is, what the reasons are for having the troops in Lebanon beyond the first 60 days, and it would have given Congress additional time to weigh and analyze the information that we think we should have on behalf of the American people in order to render a correct judgment on the resolution. We failed, and then we tried to reduce the 18 months, and again we failed.

So, every effort having been made to make the resolution a more tolerable and more acceptable resolution, there was no alternative on this Senator's part but to vote against it.

If my amendment had been adopted, I would have supported the resolution. Even if only the reduction in time had been adopted, I might have supported it. I am not going to say categorically that I would have supported it, but I might have. However, both those efforts went down, and to a considerable extent—at least in one of those two instances—went down on a strict party line vote. But at no time was my effort made on the basis of politics to get any Senator to vote one way or the other on the final resolution.

But there are circumstances in which the final resolution would have received more votes on this side than it otherwise did—if the Senate had accepted one or both of the basic amendments that we offered. In the one case, I would have voted for the resolution had my amendment been adopted. In the second case, I might have voted for the resolution. But it was strictly a matter, as I say, of conscience, of logic, and of commonsense.

The discussions in the five caucuses were intense; they were informed discussions. At no time was the political aspect ever mentioned, and the minutes of the caucuses will show that. At no time did I make the slightest effort to get any Senator to vote for or against the final resolution. It was not a matter of politics with me, and I do not think it was with the others on this side, because nobody in those caucuses ever referred to the matter in a political or partisan way, but always on the merits.

I want to compliment my colleagues for the fine way in which they discussed this serious matter and reached their conclusions, on the merits, on the logic, commonsense, and conscience. Yet, 43 Democrats and 3 Republicans reached the same conclusion.

I thank the Senator for yielding. I ask unanimous consent that the time I have used not be charged against him under the order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise to comment on the action that the Senate has just taken with respect to the authorization for continued American involvement in Lebanon. I think it is important to note for the record right now today that this resolution, although it passed, does not have the broad support of the Senate that I think is required to give this resolution sufficient meaning.

I think a vote of 54 to 46 on a matter of this gravity, showing that kind of nearly equal division in the Senate on this issue, is a very powerful illustration of the fact that this legislation is defective, and I think is clearly defective on its face in terms of an inability to marshal a substantial majority, if not an overwhelming majority, of the Members of the Senate.

It is important to note for the record something that may not be obvious otherwise because it will not show up in the debate and may not show up in the news reports. But as we were concluding the vote on the floor just moments ago and time had expired, the 15-minute voting period had expired, the final outcome of this issue was still in doubt and there were Members standing down in the well who had not yet voted and who were trying at the last minute to decide how they would vote on this issue. It was obvious that some of those Members were under tremendous pressure to cast a vote for the resolution, whether for reasons of supporting the President or supporting the party or what have you. And some minutes elapsed in which that process went on. Finally, the remaining votes were cast and by a very narrow margin, 54 to 46, this resolution passed.

It is significant to note that in that final vote total there were only two Members of this side of the aisle who saw fit to support the resolution and there on the other side who cast their votes in opposition.

I am confident that if this vote had been taken in secret by a secret ballot this resolution would have been voted down. It would not have passed. It would not have passed. I think the proof of that is just what we saw here, and that was the requirement for the persuasion, the arm twisting if you will, that went on at the end to produce the margin of victory on this particular issue.

Well, that is not the way in my judgment this kind of an issue ought to be decided. I think any time this country is going to commit itself with an open-ended authority of this kind, with the prospect of an expanded military effort by the United States abroad, out over the next 18 months, that there ought to be an overwhelming bipartisan show of support here in the U.S. Senate. Well that support is absent, because there is not that degree of consensus; there is profound division on this issue. And but for I think tremendous pressure in terms of lining up those last few votes this resolution would have been defeated today. It would have been defeated right here on this floor 10 minutes ago.

So I think it is important that the country understand what happened here. This was not an action in which the Senate, on any broad base, was saying, "Yes, let us go into Lebanon in the next 18 months and do whatever may be required and whatever the President in his judgment may think is needed." That is not what this Senate in any broad way is prepared to say. As a matter of fact, I think the vote shows quite to the contrary, that there is enormous apprehension, there is enormous uneasiness, and, as a matter of fact, 46 of the 100 Senators found themselves unable to vote for this measure on final passage.

So this resolution is not a license to Americanize this war in Lebanon. And if that should be the thought lurking in the mind of anyone who works for the President or is part of the foreign policy machinery in the executive branch of Government, then they better start thinking about it again, because there is not the support here for that kind of an action. And there are those of us here on the floor that if an effort is made to try to take and go beyond this resolution, we will use every means and I will at my command, to oppose that effort and to oppose those actions.

When the Secretary of State appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee just a week ago, under very pointed questioning, he was unwilling to commit himself to living within the letter and the spirit of this resolution, which was a good reason I think not to vote for it. It was defective in its own right, but that lack of a willingness by the administration to commit themselves to following it I think was another fatal defect.

So I would hope that the Secretary of State, and others who were part of the foreign policy machinery of this administration, would not mistake what has happened here, because it is not the desire, as I read it, of the Senate of the United States to plunge deeply into Lebanon in a military way with American efforts, although the risks of that, it seems to me, are very high and those risks will be with us for some time.

So while the final totals will show that the resolution passed today, I repeat again, it is my belief that if this vote had been taken in secret, a secret ballot, it would not have passed because it did not deserve to pass.

I yield the floor.

Mr. WEICKER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATOR BAKER AND SENATOR DOLE

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, earlier this year, U.S. News & World Report polled 1,717 opinion leaders in 29 fields, asking them to rank the 30 most influential Americans.

It was no surprise that our own colleague and distinguished leader, Senator HOWARD BAKER of Tennessee, ranked fifth from the top.

As Senator DOLE said recently in an open letter to the people of Tennessee, when their senior Senator retires from the Senate in 1985, he will leave a great vacuum in his wake.

For the record, I wish to share Senator DOLE's open letter with all in this body who have been privileged to serve under HOWARD BAKER'S leadership.

But first, I wish to add a few choice words regarding the letter's author—my chairman on the Finance Committee.

Certainly, the Lord threw away the mold when he made BOB DOLE. He is one of a kind, and as HOWARD BAKER himself admitted in a recent Newsweek interview, BOB DOLE's image has often not matched the man.

"I was not a BOB DOLE Admirer before 1980," HOWARD admitted in print read worldwide. "I thought he was caustic and harsh." But Senator BAKER has since come to describe his good friend from Kansas as a man of courage, vision, and rare compassion. His own painful encounter with suffering, after sustaining a severe wound in World War II, helped produce one of America's most outstanding leaders of this generation. Handicapped Americans, especially, have won a wonderful friend in this Kansas Senator: Earlier this year he established the Dole Foundation to help educate and train handicapped citizens, to help assure them richer lives.

Last year, radio station WMAL here in Washington asked reporters covering the Senate to rank its most outstanding Members. Topping the list was this pair of Republicans—HOWARD BAKER and BOB DOLE. So HOWARD, I join BOB DOLE in saying we will sorely miss you. But BOB—we are relieved to hang onto you. So do not get any big ideas about moving down to 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue.

I would like to insert Senator DOLE's entire letter in the RECORD. But first, an excerpt or two:

Andrew Jackson once defined the heart and soul of true leadership: "One man with courage makes a majority." For the past 16 years now, another Tennessean has embodied Jackson's concept. Since January 1967, he has lent grace as well as courage to the United States Senate. As you well know, he now prepares to return to the people who sent him to Washington. And the Volunteer State can take enormous pride in this citizen-politician from Huntsville, who volunteered his gift for leading at a special time in American history.

Quoting Senator DOLE, but speaking also for myself:

Howard, we will miss you.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRASSLEY. I yield to the Senator from Kansas, yes.

Mr. DOLE. I first want to thank my colleagues from the State of Iowa. I hope I may live long enough to deserve those kind comments.

I want to reiterate his comments concerning the distinguished majority leader who is now in the Chamber, if we could have the attention of the majority leader.

Senator GRASSLEY just made an outstanding statement concerning the leadership of this distinguished Tennessean. He has included in his remarks reference to an open letter I had written to a Tennessee paper. I just want to reiterate what I indicated in those remarks and what Senator GRASSLEY has indicated on the Senate floor, that Senator BAKER is truly an outstanding leader. We are very pleased on both sides of the aisle to have the privilege of his leadership.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Kansas for originating the article. It is a true statement of a true statesman. The title of the column is: "A New Title for Senator Baker: Statesman."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the column from the Knoxville News-Sentinel, dated August 2, 1983, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the column was ordered to be printed in the RECORD,

A NEW TITLE FOR BAKER: STATESMAN

(Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan.) wrote this guest column as an open letter to the people of Tennessee about his colleague, Sen. Howard Baker.)

Andrew Jackson once defined the heart and soul of true leadership: "One man with courage makes a majority." For the past 16 years now, another Tennessean has embodied Jackson's concept. Since January 1967, he has lent grace as well as courage to the United States Senate. As you well know, he now prepares to return to the people who sent him to Washington. And the Volunteer State can take enormous pride in this citizen-politician from Huntsville, who volunteered his gift for leading at a special time in American history.

Howard, will will miss you.

THE MANDATE

I came to Congress myself back in 1961, when a vibrant president offered a new dream. Now that dream is being dusted off anew, thanks to Ronald Reagan, his faith in America, and his allies in Congress who share that faith. In all those years, believe me, Howard and I have seen a lot of changes. But perhaps none of them as dramatic as the people's mandate of 1980. I was lucky enough to be one of the early winners in my reelection bid at that memorable election year. Of course, if wasn't my race that captured the attention—Ronald Reagan's stunning landslide did that. But the change in control of the Senate was perhaps as important as the change at the White House. History was in the making and Sen. Baker telephoned me in Topeka to share the moment.

"Bob" he said enthusiastically, "if things keep going the way they seem to be, we'll take over the Senate for the first time in 26, and you're going to be chairman of the Senate Finance Committee."

"That's great, Howard," I replied, "But who's going to tell Russell Long?"

The Democrat senator from Louisiana had occupied that position for 14 years. To a lot of people, he was the Finance Committee. We didn't, of course, have to tell Russell Long or Majority Leader Robert C. Byrd—the voters did it for us. Eighty million had spoken, demanding changes of policy and a reordering of priorities. A new order was about to unfold—and Howard Baker was going to be the leader. Yet, that was only the beginning. When your senator called me on that November night some 20 months ago, I doubt if either one of us fully realized the awesome challenge entrusted to us by the voters of America.

THE LEADER

Since then, Sen. Baker has never forgotten the main function of a majority leader—to lead a majority. That principle requires compromise as well as courage. It demands the patience of a saint, the good humor of a sage, and the practical skills of a seasoned tactician. It also requires about 24 hours of each day.

There have probably been more than a few of you who have found yourselves in Washington during the past couple of years, and visited the office of your senior senator only to be told that he was somewhere else. Well, let me tell you where he was. When the Senate is in session, he runs the show. When he isn't debating a bill or shaping a budget, he's probably at the White House, formulating legislative strategy, or lending the weight of his experience to the President of the United States.

If Ronald Reagan has launched a revolution, then Howard Baker has certainly been prominent in its front ranks. Thanks in small part to his efforts, your taxes have been reduced and reformed. Your government has been made more responsive to grassroots sentiment. Your nation's defenses have been strengthened. And your Congress—at least the Senate—has taken on a note of dignity and decorum in keeping with its historical standards.

THE STATESMAN

I have had the privilege of serving in Washington for more than 22 years. Through six presidencies and 11 Congresses, I have had the opportunity of working with and learning from some of the most powerful officials in our recent history. But of all the men and women that I have encountered since January of 1961, there are a precious few who stand apart. Gerald Ford, Hubert Humphrey and Everett Dirksen come to mind.

When the history of this era is written, there's no doubt the senator from Huntsville will take his place among the handful entitled to be called "statesmen." And that honor has already been determined in a career that is far from complete.

So, why have I written this letter to the people of Tennessee? To thank you from the heart for sending Howard Baker to the United States Senate.

Those of us who remain will miss him, but we have benefited greatly from his presence.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRASSLEY. I yield.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I must confess surprise. I did not know the Senator from Iowa and my good friend was about to make these remarks or that the Senator from Kansas was about to make remarks. I am grateful in the extreme. I thank them.

I have not read the article, but I assure him I will. I am sure I will be intoxicated with the wine that flows from it.

I really am grateful. Any time there are statements of approval or approbation for my actions in the Senate, I count it a great pleasure against those times when remarks might not be so kindly.

Seriously, it is a pleasure to serve with the Senator from Iowa. I express my special appreciation, too, to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. President, I recall so clearly the first time I met Senator GRASSLEY, then Congressman GRASSLEY. He invited me to speak to a Lincoln Day district meeting in his State. I came back from that meeting knowing intuitively, instinctively, and certainly that this man had a strong bond of support with his constituents and was destined to go far. He has gone a long way in the Senate and will go further.

CHARLES GRASSLEY: A WORKHORSE FROM NEW HARTFORD

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas would like to offer a few words about his friend and colleague from Iowa, CHARLES GRASSLEY.

Earlier today, on the Senate floor, the Senator from Iowa was kind enough to make some flattering comments about HOWARD BAKER and an article that this Senator wrote in praise of the distinguished majority leader.

But Senator GRASSLEY, in his typically gracious way, also made some very complimentary comments about me.

Let me tell you, his unsolicited remarks are deeply appreciated. As every Member of this body knows, CHUCK GRASSLEY is one of the hardest working Senators in the history of the U.S. Congress. As chairman of the Finance Committee, I know firsthand the kind of dedication, energy, and ideas Senator GRASSLEY brings to work with him every day.

Of course, the hard work pays off for constitutents. But then, that is why Iowans, year after year, have elected CHUCK GRASSLEY to be their representative on Capitol Hill.

Do not underestimate this talented man from New Hartford. He is going to go far in this body.

REQUEST FOR THE PRINTING OF THE CONTINUING RESOLUTION FOR FISCAL YEAR 1984 (H.J. RES. 368)

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that House Joint Resolution 368, the first continuing resolution for fiscal year 1984, be printed with the recommended amendments of the Committee on Appropriations, in linetype and italicized, as shown in the committee print of the House joint resolution which I now send to the desk. I further ask unanimous consent that this reprint be deemed the official version of the measure for the purpose of Senate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, this unusual procedure is necessary to facilitate Senate consideration of the continuing resolution which passed the House only late last night. The Senate Committee on Appropriations also met yesterday and authorized Senator STENNIS, the ranking minority member of the committee, and myself, to offer these amendments on behalf of the committee when the House-passed joint resolution was received and considered by the Senate. My request will incorporate the substance of the committee recommendations in the House bill currently on the calendar so that it will be printed in the form as if it were reported by the committee. This will permit the usual Senate floor consideration of appropriations bills by clearly delineating the amendments recommended by the committee. To expedite its availability in the Senate, this reprint will be prepared in the service department rather than at GPO as is customary.

Mr. President, I would further like to make clear that this request in no way adopts or implies agreement with any of the committee amendments. Each amendment will have to be considered and voted upon when this measure is brought up in the Senate.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am happy to report, according to my information, that the parties who wished to confer on the unanimous-consent agreement have resolved their problems. I will now state the request for the benefit of the minority leader and all Senators.

I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate turns to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 368, the continuing resolution, it be considered under the following time agreement: 2 hours on the resolution to be equally divided between the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the ranking minority member or their designees; that no amendments be in order with the exception of amendments to be offered on behalf of the committee that were authorized by the full committee on Wednesday, September 28; that there be 5 minutes on any debatable motion, appeal, or point of order, if it is submitted to the Senate, and that the agreement be in the usual form with respect to the division and control of time.

Mr. President, I add to my request that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the continuing resolution, so there is one request, that the Senate now go to the continuing resolution by unanimous consent on these conditions.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I just want to say again that I am acceding to this request because I think the continuing resolution, which is necessary because of the expiring deadline tomorrow night, is so important that we not hold up the Senate at the moment with respect to the amendment which I have on the State authorization bill concerning Mr. Watt and the request that the President ask for his resignation.

Second, I would agree to this if the Senator would include in his request that the expiration date on the resolution be moved from November 17 to November 10. Otherwise, you are shut out by the very request "no amendments be in order."

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I guess that is right. The committee did not report such an amendment, but I understand they are prepared to do so. So I amend the request so this only one amendment other than the committee recommended amendments be in order, and that be an amendment to change the date for the expiration of the continuing resolution from November 17 to November 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank all parties.

CONTINUING APPROPRIATIONS—1984

Mr. BAKER. I now ask, Mr. President, that the Chair lay before the Senate the continuing resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the Senate has now turned to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 368, the continuing resolution for fiscal year 1984. This measure passed the House last evening by a vote of 261 to 160 under a closed rule. It is a clean CR.

In anticipation of House action, the Committee on Appropriations met yesterday and authorized Senator STENNIS and myself to offer certain amendments on behalf of the committee to the House measure. As I indicated yesterday when I reported to the Senate on the committee's action. I am most proud that my colleagues on the committee withheld their extraneous amendments and did not press legislative provisions which intrude on authorizing committee jurisdiction and so often complicate the consideration of these resolutions. The amendments that Senator STENNIS and myself will offer on behalf of the committee pertain to the spending rates of the nine bills covered by the resolution, the expiration date, and other technical and boilerplate provisions required for a continuing resolution. Specifically, we have amended the House resolution to set the spending rates for Agriculture, Interior, and Labor-HHS at the level of the Senate bill, rather than at the House bill level established in the House CR; to set the rate for the Commerce bill at the lower of the House or Senate bill level, rather than the level of the House bill as proposed in the House CR; to set the rate for military construction and the District of Columbia at the conference report level rather than the lower of the House or Senate bill level; and to set the rate for Defense at an annual rate of $253,000,000,000, rather than the lower of the current rate or the President's request, as proposed by the House. The committee also recommended a change in the expiration date from November 15 to November 17. I understand that the leadership would like to revise that to November 10, and I will offer an amendment to that effect shortly.

I want to emphasize that this is an interim measure. The appropriations process is farther advanced than it has been since 1977. We have four bills signed into law, two more expected momentarily, one in conference today, another conference expected shortly, another four reported from committee and awaiting floor action, and the last, the defense bill, scheduled for subcommittee markup next week and full committee action after the October recess. There is every reason to believe that we will be successful in sending at least eight of the nine remaining regular appropriations bills, with the possible exception of foreign operations, to the President before this temporary continuing resolution expires. There is no reason for Senators to load this measure up with any and all amendments that may come to mind, because all the normal appropriations vehicles are moving. Senator STENNIS joins me in urging all our colleagues to refrain from amending this measure, so we can pass it expeditiously this afternoon, go to conference tomorrow, and clear the measure for the President, avoiding an all-night session, a weekend endurance contest, and the possibility of a Government shutdown come Monday. Now that we have the unanimous-consent agreement it makes it more possible for this to be achieved.

The Office of Management and Budget, in its official "Statement of Administration Policy" joins us in urging swift action on the CR.

And finally, before turning to some explanation of particular items, I want to be sure Senators know that the resolution recommended by the committee would provide a spending level for nondefense below that passed by the House, and is within the limits of the budget resolution.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

For programs covered by the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, the committee recommends a spending level formula similar to that adopted in the first continuing resolution for fiscal year 1983: an increased level based on an annual rate of $253,000,000,000, to be distributed among Department accounts on a pro rata basis subject to the terms and conditions of the regular and supplemental Defense Appropriation bills for fiscal year 1983. The recommended annual rate is midway between the fiscal year 1984 budget authority targets adopted by the Senate and House Appropriations Committees under the section 302(b) allocation process of the Congressional Budget Act.

Further, the committee recommends a provision adjusting specific spending program levels to those contained in a Defense Appropriations Act when reported in the Senate or the House, or at the lesser amount and more restrictive authority of the House or Senate versions when both Houses have reported bills. This provision is designed to encourage early enactment of a regular 1984 bill.

The committee also recommends a prohibition on any new production starts on major weapons systems until November 17, 1983, in order to preserve congressional options in the pending regular appropriation bill.

The House version of the Defense spending authority would have held the Department to the levels of fiscal year 1983 or the President's budget request, whichever were lower, with the restriction applied to the subprogram level. The Congressional Budget Office estimated this formula would constrain spending to a rate of $228,000,000,000—lower than that provided for Defense last year in the first continuing resolution for fiscal year 1983. There is evidence that a specifically applied rate so constrained could disrupt normal contracting and program management practices even over the brief period of the continuing resolution authority.

FOREIGN OPERATONS

Activities funded under the Foreign Assistance Appropriations Act are provided for at a rate of operations at the current level or the administration's budget request, whichever is lower. The committee expects that departments and agencies which receive funding under this section will avoid the obligation of funds for specific budget line items or program allocations on which congressional committees have expressed strong criticism. Specifically, the Senate Appropriations Committee reported a regular fiscal year 1984 bill on September 27, 1983, wich contains funding levels for some activities which are lower than would be provided under the formula of this continuing resolution. The committee expects that the rate of spending for those activities will not exceed that provided in the Senate-reported bill. Some of the accounts affected include the Inter-American Development Bank, the International Development Association, and the Economic Support Fund.

It is the committee's intent that the lower of the total amount contained in Public Law 97-377 for functional development assistance or the total for such assistance contained in the fiscal year 1984 budget estimate will be the rate for operations for functional development assistance under this resolution. It is also the committee's intent that the amount provided for each functional account will be the same as that contained in Public Law 97-377.

The charter of the Export-Import Bank expires on September 30, 1983. While new charter legislation is nearly completed by Congress, it is doubtful that this legislation will be enacted before September 30, 1983. some concern has been expressed, therefore, that the operations of the Eximbank would have to cease on October 1, 1983. The committee has included language, also included by the House, which provides funding for the Export-Import Bank "notwithstanding * * * any other provision of law." The committee intends that this language allow the Export-Import Bank to continue its operations during the period of the continuing resolution, and before enactment of a new charter.

REVENUE FOREGONE SUBSIDY

The funding provided in this continuing resolution allows rates for payment to the Postal Service fund is for the revenue foregone subsidy. The committee has allowed the Postal Service to adjust rates to step 15 of the phasing agreement. This is the same action proposed in S. 1646, the fiscal year 1984 Treasury, Postal Service, and general government appropriations bill. The House language would maintain rates effective on September 1, 1983 (step 14), or the current rate. The continuing resolution also directs continuation of 6-day mail delivery, rural delivery, and continues free mail for the blind.

BLUE-COLLAR PAY CAP

For the past several years the continuing resolution has included a provision to insure that Federal wage employees will be held to the same pay increase limit that applies to other Federal employees. The committee has continued that language in this continuing resolution. The House language continues the provision as the committee does, but excludes three areas included in the Senate provision. They are: Overseas teachers, individuals covered in the wage area described in section 780 of Public Law 97-114, and rate supervisors.

HEALTH PROGRAMS

The Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1983—Public Law 98-63—continued funding for health systems agencies for States without local planning agencies. The continuing resolution continues that eligibility through the period of the CR in section 101(f) by providing amounts "under the terms and conditions" of applicable appropriation acts for fiscal year 1983 and continuing health planning activities authorized under title XV of the Public Health Service Act.

Mr. President, I yield to the very distinguished ranking minority member of the committee, Senator STENNIS, of Mississippi, whose support has been absolutely imperative and necessary in order to achieve this rather remarkable feat up to this point.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I shall be brief in my remarks here.

I wish to greatly emphasize the importance of the work that has been done by the chairman and other members of the committee, including our valuable staff members, and it is a remarkable piece of work in another way, timewise, in that all this could be put together and gotten together and so thoroughly understood as to get virtually unanimous consent agreement with reference to the amendments or the absence of amendments, and those that have not been through this many times could hardly realize how much this leadership on the part of our chairman has meant and the good results that it has brought.

I certainly am pleased that we have a prospect here now of sending this continuing resolution on, not loaded down with a great number of amendments, even though any amendment proposed in the future is certainly going to have its day in court and can be taken care of.

This restores to a continuing resolution its original status and it is an original clean undertaking legislativewise, and it will be used for a very short time. We are apparently going to get it passed in a speedy manner now due to the previous work and it will serve its purpose here of serving for a few weeks, a very few weeks, into the new fiscal year that begins next Saturday morning.

Mr. President, at the outset of our consideration of this measure, I want to especially commond our fine chairman, the Senator from Oregon, and the members of the Committee on Appropriations for what I consider to be responsible and timely action in the committee's handling and processing of this highly important matter. I fully subscribe to and endorse what our chairman has said in explanation of the committee's action and the committee's amendments to be offered.

While I dislike resorting to continuing resolutions and, even more so, the most recent practices in the way the Congress has been using continuing resolutions, we are nevertheless, faced with this situation in which we find ourselves today. The end of the fiscal year is fast approaching—a little over 24 hours from now. Continuing resolutions by their very nature must be enacted promptly and this resolution is no exception.

We are all familiar with the recent growing tendency in the Congress to try to resolve numerous legislative matters, controversies and issues on continuing resolutions and we have all generally deplored that condition in committee and here on the floor. However, with this resolution, Mr. President, I am proud to say that we, as a committee, are reversing that bad habit. By not including these extraneous matters, the continuing resolution will be restored to its proper function and role and will once again be used as it was originally meant—to be a temporary, interim measure, not to be used as a vehicle for every legislative controversy.

So it is, Mr. President, that this resolution with the committee amendments to be offered is a clean and simplified measure and we urge that the Senate keep it that way. There will be a number of other appropriate measures coming before the Senate shortly on which Members will have an opportunity to offer amendments and I know of several meritorious matters that remain to be addressed in this body that will be offered on those vehicles. Members of our committee had highly important and meritorious matters and have deferred in offering them at this time and we again urge the Senate's cooperation and support.

I join with the chairman in the request that we keep this as a relatively clean and simplified resolution and pass it promptly.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments to House Joint Resolution 368 be considered and agreed to en bloc and provided that no points of order are waived thereon and the measure as amended be considered as orginal text for the purpose of further amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. STENNIS. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2242

(Purpose: To shorten the duration of the continuing resolution)

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) proposes an amendment numbered 2242.

On page 13 line 8 strike "November 17, 1983" and insert in lieu thereof "November 10, 1983".

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, this was the one amendment incorporated in the unanimous-consent agreement on the request of the leadership that the date of expiration be changed from November 17 to November 10. The purpose of this is not to push the expiration up against the projected sine die date of November 18 for adjournment.

So at the request of the leadership that is the purpose of offering the amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment (No. 2242) was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, let me make clear in the record the intent of Congress concerning the administration's proposal to distribute refugee and entrant assistance funds under a block grant. As the report language in the Labor-HHS appropriations bill specifies, it is the intent of Congress that the administration not proceed with any administratively proposed block grant, per capita grant, or similar consolidation of the refugee resettlement program in fiscal year 1984.

The Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR), has already published in the Federal Register for the purpose of public comment a block grant funding proposal. Theoretically, ORR could proceed with the publication of regulations during the interim between the first continuing resolution and the second continuing resolution. While I do not believe ORR would pursue such a strategy, I do want to make manifest the will of Congress on this subject so that there can be no misunderstanding.

Permit me to summarize the current status of the administration's proposal in Congress. First, the House had placed language in the continuing resolution which would have forbidden ORR from publishing block grant regulations. The House removed this language from the bill to permit a clean bill to come over so that the Senate could swiftly process the continuing resolution before Saturday's deadline. Second, neither the Senate nor the House has reauthorized the Refugee Act, the authorizing legislation which governs the manner in which refugee assistance is channeled to the States. At this moment, both of the Judiciary Committees of Congress are reviewing the reauthorization legislation. The House Judiciary Committee has gone on record in opposition to the block grant/per capita proposal. The Senate Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy has not decided the precise direction it wishes to follow in its version of the reauthorization bill. At a minimum, however, one can conclude that it would be patently premature for ORR to proceed with the publication of block grant regs when the reauthorization bill has not been approved by either body of Congress.

I hope that this statement is an unnecessary amplification of congressional intent on this subject. Again, it seems unlikely that ORR would publish the regulations before the issue as to whether Congress wants block grant funding or refugee assistance has been decided. However, because many of the Governors of the States which have the largest refugee populations have come out in opposition to the block grant proposal, this precautionary effort seems warranted. I thank the Chair.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Labor-HHS and Education Subcommittee, Mr. WEICKER, to clarify the intent of the committee with respect to funding for the impact aid program.

It is my understanding that the committee expects the Secretary of Education to make preliminary payments to eligible local educational agencies in accordance with the criteria established in the first continuing resolution making appropriations for fiscal year 1983.

Mr. WEICKER. The Senator from South Dakota is correct. In addition, the committee expects the Secretary to make preliminary payments—which will be utilized by federally impacted local educational agencies during the current school year—in a timely manner.

Mr. ABDNOR. This Senator also understands that the committee does not intend the Secretary of Education, in disbursing funds for both components of the impact aid program—Public Law 81-874 and Public Law 81-815—to take into consideration the terms and conditions set forth in the jobs bill—Public Law 98-8.

Mr. WEICKER. The Senator is correct. The committee intends to provide no more than the authorized level of $20 million for impact aid construction—Public Law 81-815. Remaining program funds are to be expended under Public Law 81-874.

Mr. ABDNOR. I appreciate the opportunity to clarify these matters and I thank the Senator from Connecticut for the continued help and cooperation of he and his able staff.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, the continuing resolution before the Senate as it relates to items under the jurisdiction of the Foreign Operations Appropriations Subcommittee provides for a rate of spending which is the lower of the current rate or the President's request.

While there are a number of items of concern to the committee, as well as other Members of the Senate, which would receive significantly lower funding levels than desired, the committee is recommending that we accept the House version in light of the desire of the Senate leadership to move this matter quickly, and, of course, the duration of the continuing resolution is only for 45 days. A preferable action might have been to reference the foreign assistance bill that the committee reported last Tuesday, but to do so would have resulted in a protracted and probably not very successful conference with the House.

Therefore, Senator INOUYE, the ranking minority member of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee, and I, will resist amendments to the foreign operations section, as will the committee leadership, but I do wish to be straightforward in saying that if amendments adding other items succeed on the floor, we would be forced to add the provisions of the bill that we reported. Such an action would be necessary because of the possibility that certain add-ons would have the effect of reducing the incentive to either pass a regular bill during the 45-day period, or to provide a second continuing resolution which would provide for the additional needs requested by the administration and supported by the Senate.

Another factor in our recommendation is the desire, as expressed by the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee and the chairman of the House Subcommittee on Foreign Operations that we proceed on this matter and conference on all of the foreign assistance matters either through a regular bill or the second continuing resolution.

Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the committee, Senator HATFIELD, has already presented an explanation of the continuing resolution, including the foreign operations section, but I would like to emphasize a couple of points. First of all, the committee has taken the position that departments and agencies which receive funding under the continuing resolution should avoid the obligation of funds for specific budget line items or program allocations on which congressional committees have expressed strong criticism. Specifically, with reference to items under the foreign operations section, the committee has reported a regular bill which contains funding levels for some activities that are lower than would be provided under the formula of this continuing resolution. The committee expects that the rate of funding for those activities will not exceed that provided in the Senate reported bill. As the chairman has mentioned, some of accounts affected include the Inter-American Development Bank, the International Development Association, and the Economic Support Fund.

The second item I wish to highlight is a concern over the operations of the Export-Import Bank. It is clear that new charter legislation will not be completed before September 30, 1983, but the committee has included language in the continuing resolution, also included by the House, which provides funding for the Export-Import Bank "notwithstanding * * * any other provision of law." The committee intends that this language allow the Export-Import Bank to continue its borrowing authority and operations during the period of the continuing resolution.

The last item I want to mention, Mr. President, is that I am informed that there is some dispute downtown over the committee's intentions with respect to the funding for the International Fund for Agricultural Development. It is clear that the committee intends that IFAD receive $40 million under this continuing resolution, which is the lower amount as provided in Public Law 97-377 and Public Law 98-63.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I rise to support this continuing resolution. I can assure you that I have strong feelings regarding amendments I would like to have adopted, however, I am fully cognizant of the time problems we are facing. I have therefore restrained from offering those amendments.

The Treasury, Postal Service and general government bill has yet to be passed. The Senate has reported a bill, however, the other body has failed at this time to take positive action. As subcommittee chairman, I would like to note that we are proposing that the agencies in this bill continue operations at the fiscal year 1983 level. There are some agencies which will face problems. The Customs Service is a prime example.

The Customs Service has been given new responsibilities with regard to the war on crime. The agency will have to make internal adjustments and I, along with my good friend and the chairman of the House subcommittee are committed to do what we can to see Customs carry out its responsibilities efficiently and effectively.

I might also add that the fiscal year 1983 rate in the 1984 continuing resolution for General Service Administration through November 17 is not intended to slow down or stop operations that are integral to the agency's basic functions, which includes but is not limited to operation of buildings and payments for leased space in the Federal buildings fund. In other words it is the subcommittee's observation that they should continue at current funding levels and should include reprogramings and organizational transfers approved by the Appropriations Committees even though the annualized cost for this period would exceed last year's rate.

In closing, I reiterate my support of the committee position and pay compliment to the chairman for his effort to expedite action on this measure.

THE CONTINUING UNRESOLVED DEFICITS

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, the spending bill before the Senate is aptly named. It is a continuing resolution. It neither improves our deficit problem, nor makes it substantially worse. It just continues the operation of Government for several more weeks.

It really changes nothing. But if this spending resolution is not the vehicle to attack the deficit problem, the time for change better not be far off. We are running out of time.

Two weeks from now, we will begin to deal with the reconciliation steps designed to match the budget promises we made in June. By then, we will have just 10 weeks left in the year before the elections.

I am afraid we are getting ourselves into a situation where real action on the deficit will be prevented by a roadblock of excuses. Some will say, "You cannot do much in an election year." Some will say, "We are in an economic recovery. Let us not tamper with it."

Let us not invent reasons for inaction, Mr. President. Maybe we can slide by another few months with the numbers saying things are better. But the number that really counts—a $200 billion deficit—has not changed. It continues. And unless we do something this year to reduce it, I am afraid it will continue for years to come.

If that happens, I can tell you something that will not be continuing—economic recovery.

My reason for speaking today is to neither praise nor condemn the continuing resolution. It is really not much more than a mechanical device. What I really want to do is to remind my colleagues of a threat we cannot overlook any time we talk about money.

And that threat is the Federal deficit.

Mr. President, John Foster Dulles used to measure success by saying it is not whether you have a tough problem, but whether it is the same tough problem you had last year.

If you apply the Dulles definition of success to the condition of the Federal deficit it is enough to make him quake in the hereafter.

Not only do we have the same deficit problem, it is about twice as bad as last year's, and three times worse than the year before that.

Unless we do something about the deficit problem this year, it will be even worse next year, and worse still in the years that follow.

If we do not act against the deficits now, I am afraid we may permanently alter the nature of the economy, and I do not see it as a change for the better. If we surrender to deficits, we could cross into the brave new world of runaway debt, and we in Congress could be the first to be run over.

We have just got to understand that deficits are a threat to economic recovery. We hear that a lot; so much, in fact, that people just start tuning out. It becomes part of the political background noise. We hear Senators say that deficits matter, and people begin to think that it is just one Senator's opinion against another's.

But if you put your ear to the outside wall of the Senate, you can hear a growing number of people saying the same thing. I think we need to listen to what those voices beyond these walls are saying. And I want to give the Senate that chance.

Here is a roster of opinion with the same basic message: Deficits matter; deficits are a threat to economic recovery.

European Parliamentarians. On September 22, I invited 24 members of the European Parliamentarian Union to talk about the world economy. Every one of them told me that high interest rates were tied directly to high U.S. deficits.

And they told me that our high rates were drawing capital out of their own economies and into ours, making it that much harder for them to reestablish economic vitality in their own countries. Unlike many in this country, they were not mystified at all about why the United States seems to be in an economic recovery, in spite of a $200 billion deficit. They understand we have been able to finance Federal borrowing demands with their money. And we better understand what European nations already know: It cannot last forever.

If our high interest rates continue to take capital out of foreign economics, we will do fine for a while. But, if other nations cannot buy our goods, if our export market dries up, that in itself will threaten our economy.

National Association of Mutual Savings Banks. I spoke with these bankers on September 20 about deficits. They shared with me a copy of a letter they have circulated describing their concerns about deficits. Let me read you an excerpt:

The budget deficits create a crisis. There will be no political winners if the Administration and the Congress fail to accommodate differences and cooperate * * * to deal with current serious economic problems. The threat to our Nation requires prompt, effective, and bipartisan action now.

Of course, Mr. President, these are the people who loan much of the money for housing in the country. They are right in the middle. When big deficits push up interest rates, buyers cannot afford homes, and mortgage bankers are strapped themselves by the high cost of money. They say everyone is threatened by big deficits. And they are right.

Senator DOLE, the distinguished chairman of the Senate Finance Committee has a gift for getting right to the point. In August he said budget deficits are the most serious domestic concern facing the Nation. And he went on to say that a legislature that cannot mobilize itself to deal with the most serious domestic concern facing the Nation cannot be taken seriously.

He is right on both counts, and that reinforces the case to do something about deficits right now.

USA Today, on August 12, 1983, they ran an editorial, which ranged over the whole deficit problem. Let me read a few excerpts:

Washington's politicians are gambling with our economic future . . . If nothing is done about deficits, high interest rates could sap the housing industry, encourage imports to steal American jobs and drag down the recovery . . . The survival of this recovery depends on Congress and the President. So far, they have neglected their responsibility to negotiate a budget that lowers deficits and curbs interest rates.

That is a pretty sweeping indictment, Mr. President. But, unless we cut deficits now, we could prove them prophets.

State Governors. When the National Governors Association gathered in Maine this July, deficits were on their minds. Governor Matheson of Utah told the Governors:

If we're not willing to face up to some tax increases pretty soon, we might as well kiss the recovery goodbye. Governor John Carlin of Kansas said, If they don't make more progress on these deficits, our work will go down the tubes.

Both these respected Governors were right. And they are deeply worried about Federal deficits, and the damage they can do to our economy.

Paul McCracken. Mr. McCracken is a professor of business administration at the University of Michigan and a former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Nixon. Writing in the Wall Street Journal, McCracken pointed out how big Federal deficits put upward pressure on interest rates. Then he said:

The problem we face is fundamentally one of regaining our capability to discipline fiscal processes. Quite simply, the budget's revenue track and outlay track must be moved closer together, and both tracks must take some movement.

And Mr. McCracken warned that next year is an election year, meaning that we better act now. He, like all the others I have quoted so far, is exactly right.

Martin Feldstein. While Paul McCracken used to be the chairman for the President's Council of Economic Advisers, the current chairman, Martin Feldstein, also sees the deficits as a major problem. Listen to what he said this July to the Senate Banking Committee:

The fundamental reason for the high level of real interest rates is the widespread expectation of large budget deficits for the remainder of the decade.

And Mr. Feldstein is as right as Mr. McCracken.

Paul Volcker. Mr. Volcker, as Chairman of the Federal Reserve, has told us so many times that deficits are a threat; some people have tired of listening to him. But I ask you to hear him out one more time. He told Congress at the end of July: "Rising private credit demands . . . are beginning to clash with the continuing heavy financing needs of the Government."

That is a fairly plain statement. But it describes the key issue in whatever hope we have to sustain economic recovery. Mr. Volcker tells us that deficits will crowd out private borrowing. He has said that before. And he has been right.

Allan Greenspan. Mr. Greenspan, a widely respected economist, told a national television audience this summer that unless Federal deficits are cut, the Nation "will not have the type of very consistent long-term growth" we would normally respect in a continuing recovery.

I chose to quote Mr. Greenspan. But you can have your pick of other economists who will tell you the same thing; deficits are a threat to economic recovery. And each of those economists, in my judgement, is right.

Malcolm Baldrige. Mr. Baldrige, of course, is the Secretary of Commerce. As chief of that department, he follows economic indicators and statistics with some care. He, too, has paid close attention to the Federal deficit, and here is the verdict he rendered in July:

If the deficit is not reduced, Federal financing demands will begin to crowd the interest-sensitive sectors out of the credit markets, jeopardizing the prospects for further recovery of residential construction.

What more do you need to say about that view, Mr. President, other than that Secretary Baldrige is right?

Congressional Budget Office. So far, I've cited the opinions of both newspapers and experts sizing up the deficit threat. Let me give you the analysis, now, of the Congressional Budget Office. That Office has won respect in all party circles for their objectivity and expertise. Listen to their view of the Federal deficit problem:

Even if the economic recovery is stronger than projected, the budget deficits will remain very large without further deficit-reducing measures. The budget resolution enacted in June begins the process of reducing the deficits. But the resolution was merely the first step. Decisive action by the Congress and the Administration is necessary to ensure that these or other deficit-reducing measures are actualy put into effect.

CBO is right. We took the first step in June when Congress agreed to the budget. The second step is 2 weeks away, when we find out what committees will do in order to comply with the budget. The last step will be ours: To make sure that we stick with the promises we made this summer to cut the deficit.

Committee for Economic Development. The Committee for Economic Development is a group of leading business people and educators vitally concerned with the path of their American economic recovery. This June they offered their assessment of Federal deficits, and here is a sample of what they had to say:

Unless promptly steps are taken to bring about a sharp reduction in the enormous and successfully growing outyear budget deficits that are now projected in the absence of corrective actions, the prospects for a sound and sustainable recovery will be impaired.

Mr. President, I do not think you can put it any more clearly than that.

Aubrey G. Lanston & Co., Inc. Maybe it can not be put more clearly. But David Jones, a leading Wall Street economist has put it more bluntly. In their July 25 bulletin, Jones noted the large Federal deficit, and said it could lead to "credit strains and rising interest rates, which, in turn, could produce a premature economic collapse."

What more do you have to say, Mr. President? Economic collapse. The deficits are that large a problem, large enough, in fact, to move former President Ford to call this summer for cancellation of tax indexing as a means of lowering the deficit.

You would think that after all the warnings, the message would have gotten through to Washington. But I am afraid the evidence suggests the message has been lost in transit. In August a "senior White House aide" was quoted in the papers saying:

We do not want to hear another word about tax increases until November 15, 1984. Nobody here gives a damn about the deficit.

A few weeks ago, the tax policy expert at the Department of the Treasury said the contingency tax increase the President requested for 1986 is all but dead. What makes that statement all but unbelievable was that the midsession review by the Office of Management and Budget still forecasts $200 billion deficits through 1988—and they included in their analysis extra revenues from the contingent tax increase, the same one the Department of the Treasury says is "all but dead."

That sounds to me like serious trouble. And just as troublesome was the Treasury Department study this year arguing that deficits have no measurable effect on interest rates.

That Treasury study, Mr. President, was garbage, a political wax job calculated to defend failure in advance.

Deficits count very much.

The minority staff of the Senate Budget Committee has produced a study called, "Deficits and Interest Rates," and, in contrast to the Treasury study, it shows forcefully just how much deficits count.

For one thing, our study showed that the Federal deficit is currently eating up 97 percent of all net savings in the United States. If that is not "crowding out," I cannot imagine what else is. Big deficits deny private borrowers access to credit, and overprice what remains by driving up interest rates.

The Senate Budget Committee pointed out something else of great importance. In the 1960's when the Federal deficit accounted for 0.8 percent of the gross national product, interest rates stood at about 4 percent. Between 1980 and 1982, when the deficit rose to 2.5 percent of GNP, interest rates shot up to 12.1 percent.

If Congress does not enforce the budget, the deficit could surge to 6.3 percent of GNP, and heaven only knows where that will take interest rates.

There is no single domestic problem more demanding of prompt action than enforcing the budget to stop the rise of Federal deficits. But some people still argue that adding any kind of taxes will be a drag on the recovery. In fact, they were saying the same thing a year ago. What has happened since then?

A year ago, with deficits climbing, we approved the President's $98 billion tax increase. By autumn, interest rates began to fall. By Christmas, recovery was underway. And the reason that happened is because the Federal Reserve saw the Congress was serious about cutting deficits, and they moved to lower the cost of borrowed money.

A year ago, economists were divided over which was the greatest threat to economic recovery, higher taxes or higher interest rates. They are not divided anymore. The full 25-percent tax cut is in place, the deficits are out of sight, and today the economists are all singing out of the same hymn book: Cut the deficits.

Just 2 weeks from the report on reconciliation, here is where we stand. Interest rates are up and climbing. Housing sales are down. That is exactly the situation we had a year ago, and then we called it "recession." Today, we can call it real trouble.

But it is trouble we can avoid, by sticking with a budget that called for $73 billion in reclaimed revenues spread out over 3 years. It is the same budget that called for $16 billion in spending restraint.

I know all those arguments from the White House about "no more revenues without more spending cuts." Well, I can tell you this. Without more revenues, we will lose even the spending restraint we have already agreed to. That is a recipe for impasse.

We can head off that prospect by going ahead with a reconciliation that sticks with the budget. It makes no sense for anybody to try and play politics with budget steps that require more revenues. If we do that, we will be underestimating the electorates' ability to sort out good sense from nonsense.

I will not detain the Senate much longer. But, in closing, I want to recall a visit I made to France earlier this year. France, as you know, has a Socialist government. But with a deficit projected to reach 3 percent of their gross national product, France has bitten the bullet, imposed austerity measures, and raised taxes.

Unless we in Congress act on our deficits, we will see over 6 percent of our own GNP eaten away by red ink by the end of 1986.

We must act now. We must approve a continuing resolution that does no further harm. And we must approve a reconciliation package which matches the budget goals we set in June.

If we will not act in 1983, and politics keeps us from acting in 1984, then I am afraid 1985 could be one of the most austere years in our economic history. We have still got a choice. And I hope we choose to cut the deficit right now.

VETERANS' EMERGENCY JOB TRAINING PROGRAM

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I would like to raise with the very able chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on HUD-Independent Agencies (Mr. GARN) a question regarding funding for the recently enacted Emergency Veterans' Job Training Act of 1983, Public Law 98-77.

This measure, which was signed into law on August 15, authorizes the appropriation in each of fiscal years 1984 and 1985 of $150 million to establish an emergency program of job training assistance for unemployed Korean conflict and Vietnam-era veterans. As my colleague from Utah will recall, on June 21, the Senate approved—as a result of an amendment offered in committee by the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI)—full funding for the new program in the HUD-Independent Agencies Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1984. However, in conference on that measure and at the request of the Office of Management and Budget, that funding was deleted and it was not included in the measure as signed into law as Public Law 98-45.

At that time, the conferees on that measure noted that they took action to delete those funds "without prejudice" and that they wanted to "wait until enactment of authorizing legislation before funding is considered."

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON) is correct. Indeed, on June 29, during the Senate's consideration of the fiscal year 1984 HUD appropriations bill, we discussed the funding for this new program. At that time, we all indicated our expectation that the enactment of the funds necessary for the new initiative would be accomplished in the context of the continuing resolution. However, in view of the effort to pass a resolution providing only continuation funding and to keep all amendments off this bill, I did not proceed, as I had intended, to add the $150 million in committee yesterday. I hope that the Senator can understand why the inclusion of funding for the new veterans' job training program will not be possible at this point.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I do understand, unfortunately, in light of the emergency nature of the pending measure, which is needed to keep vital Government operations going, a line must be drawn. Nevertheless, I am deeply disappointed that it has been drawn in such a way as to prevent making available now the funding needed to initiate the new program—especially since that program itself is of an emergency nature. However, I am well aware of how "Christmas-treeing" can get out of hand and understand the leadership's desire to preclude any and all amendments in order to avoid that possibility.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I appreciate those concerns and know how eager the distinguished ranking minority member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee is to secure this funding. I fully share his desires to get this program underway.

In this connection, I am prepared to give him my assurance that I will support the funding of the program in the supplemental appropriations measure we anticipate receiving from the House next week. As the Senator may know, the House Appropriations Committee has included the full $150 million in that measure as reported—H.R. 3959.

Mr. CRANSTON. I am grateful for the Senator's assurance. However, in the event that the supplemental appropriations measure is not approved by the Congress or has been vetoed by the President at the time that the next continuing resolution is taken up in early November, I believe that action certainly must be taken at that time to provide funding for the Emergency Veterans' Job Training Act through the second continuing resolution. Clearly, any delay beyond that point would just not be tolerable.

Mr. GARN. I fully concur with the Senator and pledge my full support for that approach.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I have been listening with great interest to this discussion between the Senators from Utah (Mr. GARN) and California (Mr. CRANSTON) and would like to note that I concur with the views they have expressed on the issue of funding for the veterans' emergency job training program. I would also like to add my assurance that, like the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on HUD-Independent Agencies, I will fully support the inclusion of funding for the program in the fiscal year 1984 supplemental measure or, if that legislation is not enacted by the time we take up the next continuing resolution for fiscal year 1984, in that second continuing resolution.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I would like to thank the distinguished Appropriations Committee chairman and subcommittee chairman for those assurances. They are most welcome.

On a related issue, Mr. President, I would like at this time to note that the House Committee on Appropriations in approving funding for the new measure in H.R. 3959, the supplemental appropriations bill, has incorporated language that apparently is intended to override the targeting provisions of the measure as enacted into law. That committee's proposal would require $25 million of the fiscal year 1984 funds to be unavailable for obligation until July 1, 1984, and thereafter to "be obligated on the basis of those veterans unemployed for the longest period of time."

As my colleagues know, the Emergency Veterans' Job Training Act provides that the veterans eligible for participation in the new program are those who are unemployed and who have been unemployed for 15 out of 20 of the weeks preceding their application for the program. We adopted these eligibility criteria in order to focus on the needs of the long-term unemployed veterans. Unemployment for 15 out of 20 weeks has traditionally been widely accepted as a measure of long-term unemployment.

However, Mr. President, apparently, the House Committee on Appropriations is not content with that approach and has incorporated language that I believe is not only unwise but also unworkable. If enacted it could pose administrative problems that would be disruptive and confusing and have the effect of denying help to many of the veterans we intended to benefit. Where employers have jobs available and are ready and able to hire veterans under the new program, Congress should not create roadblocks keeping veterans who have been out of work for more than 15 weeks from filling these jobs.

In addition, I believe the language itself is subject to a point of order in the House as it represents legislation on an appropriations measure.

Thus, I would like to alert the distinguished chairmen of the subcommittee and of the full committee, the members of the Appropriations Committee, and all of my Senate colleagues to this issue. We on the Veterans' Affairs Committees of both House and Senate took great pains to fashion a measure that could be easily administered so that the program would be both attractive to the employers and available to help unemployed veterans—without any avoidable complications or disruptions. To the extent possible in the context of authorizing legislation—as opposed to a measure establishing a conventional entitlement—I believe we succeeded and am committed to keep the administrative aspects of the program clean and simple. Thus, in the event that the House Appropriations Committee targeting language, or any similar targeting language, is presented to the Senate in any appropriations measure, I am prepared to oppose it strenuously. I hope that those members of the Appropriations Committee who will consider this issue will look at it carefully before suggesting or approving any such limiting language.

Mr. GARN. I appreciate the Senator's concerns and will certainly take them into consideration.

FARMWORKER HOUSING FOR THE CONTINUING RESOLUTION

Mr. DECONCINI. It is my understanding that House Joint Resolution 368 contains the funds necessary to continue the Department of Labor farmworker housing program and that the Department should continue all the elements of the program through the term of the continuing resolution. Is my understanding correct?

Mr. WEICKER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 368, the resolution on continuing appropriations as amended on the floor by the committee.

House Joint Resolution 368 provides appropriations through November 10 for activities ordinarily funded in nine appropriations bills. These are:

Agriculture; Commerce-State-Justice; Defense; District of Columbia; foreign operations; Interior; Labor-HHS-Education; military construction; and Treasury-Postal Service general government.

I would like to commend my distinguished colleague and chairman, Senator HATFIELD, for offering a joint resolution which is below the Appropriation Committee's 302(b) allocation by $8.7 billion in budget authority and $1.1 billion in outlays.

I would also like to praise the chairman of the committee, Senator HATFIELD, for his steady determination this year to get regular appropriations bills enacted. I note that we now have conference agreements on two of the nine measures covered by this continuing resolution (military construction and District of Columbia). A third bill (Interior) is scheduled to be conferenced today. Of the remaining six bills under this continuing resolution, all but one has been acted on by the Senate Appropriations Committee. We will hopefully see many of these bills enacted before the expiration of this continuing resolution. If we continue to make the progress we have, few, if any, of these bills will need to be funded in a second continuing resolution. I think this shows an outstanding effort on the part of the Senate Appropriations Committee members and the chairman and the ranking member of the committee.

My fellow Appropriations Committee members have shown discipline and restraint on the measure before us.

Many members of the Appropriations Committee spoke during markup of amendments which they had considered offering to the continuing resolution.

But, recognizing that this is a temporary measure lasting only to November 10, and recognizing that the House as a whole would resist adding any extraneous amendments, my colleagues on the Appropriations Committee did likewise.

I urge all other Senators to exercise the same self-discipline exhibited by the members of the Appropriations Committee and to support the resolution as reported.

If the Senate is successful in this effort, I believe we can anticipate a speedy conference and a Presidential signature. Government services and operations will not be unduly disrupted.

Once again, I would like to express my pleasure as chairman of the Senate Budget Committee and as a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee in supporting a continuing resolution which fits within the budget totals approved earlier this year by this Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that tables showing the relationship of the reported bill, together with possible later requirements, outlays from prior appropriations, and adjustments to maintain mandatory programs at the budget resolution level, be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] This table has been prepared by the staff of the Senate Budget Committee based on their interpretation of the Senate continuing resolution.

Note: Details may not add to totals due to rounding.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I want to call to the attention of the Senate provisions in the continuing resolution that will have a significant, deleterious effect on the Government's public buildings program. I do not intend to offer an amendment, but I want my colleagues to understand the serious nature of what we are doing. And I want to describe what action the Committee on Environment and Public Works is taking to prevent this problem from recurring.

The continuing resolution contains provisions placing a ceiling on the standard level user charge—or SLUC, as it is unfortunately called—that Federal agencies pay to the U.S. General Services Administration for the office space they occupy. The SLUC charges were established by Congress in 1972 on the theory that agencies ought to take into account the cost of the workspace they use. The SLUC payments are paid into a special account called the Federal building fund, and it is out of that fund—and not general revenues—that the entire GSA public buildings program is funded.

The SLUC charges are, by law, supposed to be equivalent to commercial rental rates, and it is on that basis that the GSA has figured the rental rates it establishes. Now the agencies, like the rest of us, do not like their rent increased. Unlike most Americans, however, the agencies have recourse to a form of rent control. They can have OMB or their appropriations subcommittees prohibit the GSA from collecting increases in SLUC charges that are dictated by the law's requirement that GSA charge commercially equivalent rates.

For 4 years out of the 10 that the fund has operated, the agencies have done just that. In 1975 and 1976, the first years of the fund's operation, a combination of OMB and appropriations cuts in the SLUC rate resulted in a decrease of $738.5 million in fund revenues. Appropriations action for fiscal year 1983 similarly cost the fund $337 million in anticipated revenue. The ceiling on SLUC in this current continuing resolution, if carried through the entire 1984 fiscal year, will cost the fund $280 million.

Let me put that in perspective. The President's budget originally estimated new authority for obligations from the fund for fiscal year 1984 at $2.1 billion. So this cut in revenues is a reduction of over 10 percent in the public buildings program. Moreover, the OMB proposed, and this bill implements, an intriguing sleight-of-fisc, further reducing the fiscal year 1984 budget by $125 million, the amount GSA was provided in fiscal year 1983 under the emergency jobs bill we passed last March.

So the public buildings program for fiscal year 1984 is $405 million below what it was originally estimated to need. Would my colleague from New York, who has shared the burden of overseeing this program, care to explain the practical effect of this reduction?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The public buildings program has certain fixed expenses which cannot be deferred. Lease payments of $880 million will be paid in full to the ever-increasing number of private building owners who rent at favorable terms to the Government—while at the same time deducting from their tax liability depreciation and tax credits on the buildings. So will payments on so-called purchase-contract agreements under which GSA borrowed money from private investors to finance certain construction projects early in the 1970's. Utility bills for Federal offices will be paid.

What gets deferred are Federal construction projects and maintenance and renovation on existing Federal buildings. Let me explain what projects will not be carried out, due to our endorsing this rent control scheme for Federal agencies. On June 12, the Senate passed without objection, S. 1287, the Public Buildings Authorization Act of 1983, reported after careful consideration by the Committee on Environment and Public Works. The following major renovation projects listed in that bill will now not be carried out:

Suitland Md., Naval Intelligence Center	$9,760,000
Pittsburgh, Pa., Post Office	8,975,000
San Francisco, Calif., Appraisers Building	1,200,000
Denver, Colo., Federal Center Office Building	6,427,000
District of Columbia, Auditors Building 20	9,294,000
District of Columbia, Blair House	6,500,000
District of Columbia, Pension Building	2,650,000
Atlanta, Ga., Federal Annex	9,193,000
Chicago, Ill., J. C. Kluczynski Federal Building	3,319,000
Boston, Mass., J. F. K. Federal Building	2,499,000
Detroit, Mich., Pat McNamara Federal Building	5,474,000
Asheville, N.C., Grove Arcade Federal Building	8,364,000
Cincinnati, Ohio, Post Office and Courthouse	1,138,000
Cleveland, Ohio, Celebrezze Federal Building	3,951,000
San Antonio, Tex., Post Office and Courthouse	6,190,000

GSA would have to forgo small projects (those costing under $500,000 apiece) totaling $80 million in the coming year. New construction or purchases totaling $132 million are also in jeopardy. These projects include:

Waltham, Mass., Federal Archives	$1,621,000
Portland, Oreg., Bonneville Power Authority	67,475,000
Knoxville, Tenn., Federal Building	14,990,000
Seattle, Wash., Federal Archives	3,525,000
Pittsburgh, Pa., Purchase of Post Office	23,300,000
Other selected purchases	20,000,000

Let me tell you in more general terms what we are doing. By deferring major maintenance work on Federal buildings—it will be reduced $96 million—we are simply increasing the cost we will eventually have to pay to keep these buildings in working order. It is the same sort of neglect, of deferred maintenance in the interest of short-term and short-sighted budget-trimming, that is coming back to haunt us in the Nation's crumbling infrastructure of roads, bridges, sewers, and water systems.

Further, by failing to provide enough fund revenues to purchase or construct new Federal buildings and courthouses, we condemn ourselves to ever more Federal leasing. And any number of studies, the most recent published by CBO this past June, demonstrate that that is uneconomical in the long run.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thank my colleague. I recognize that we are not going to restore the SLUC rates to their proper, commercially equivalent levels. Nor are we going to appropriate general revenues into the fund to make up the difference between the reduced agency rents and the needs of our public buildings program.

Recognizing this recurring problem with the SLUC charges, the Committee on Environment and Public Works yesterday ordered reported legislation which, among other things, will abolish the Federal buildings fund and return us to a more orderly procedure of making direct appropriations for the public buildings program. The rationale for that decision will be explained more fully when the committee report on that bill, S. 452, is filed. I hope enactment of this legislation will prevent this reduction in resources for building maintenance from recurring in future years.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I understand that the Department is proceeding with its plan to terminate nearly two-thirds, or approximately 100 staff, of the Office of Community Services (OCS) workforce by tomorrow through reduction in force. Mr. Chairman, I was under the impression that the Appropriations Committee has made provision for maintaining at least the Headquarters OCS staff in the fiscal year 1984 appropriations bill markup. Is it your intent, in considering this continuing resolution, to extend the current mandate in the continuing resolution that the Secretary of HHS maintain OCS staffing at fiscal year 1982 levels until we can act on the appropriations bill?

Mr. WEICKER. The Appropriations Committee has made provision in its Labor-HHS-Education appropriations bill to maintain the existing 70 permanent OCS Headquarters staff. In the interim, this continuing resolution references the Senate bill which maintains the existing 70 permanent OCS Headquarters staff. We intend to maintain that provision in conference.

DOUBLE STANDARD ON SPENDING

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on September 28 the Senate Appropriations Commitee met to mark up the fiscal year 1984 continuing resolution.

Given the lateness of the fiscal year and the need to complete this legislation expeditiously, the chairman and ranking minority member rightly stressed the need to move this bill without amendments.

Although almost every member of the committee had amendments ready to offer to the bill, there was a general consenus that a clean bill would stand the only chance of passage before the advent of the new fiscal year. So no amendments were offered.

That is to say, no amendments but one. There was an amendment to the language as proposed to the chairman of the committee by the chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee.

This amendment substituted new language for the House language dealing with the Department of Defense. The House language established strict provisions for spending at current rates or budget estimate rates, whichever is lower. According to the Congressional Budget Office, this totaled to an overall expenditure rate of $228.1 billion.

The Senate substitute language mandates a spending rate at the $253 billion level.

Therefore, while every other amendment was held off the bill, there was one exception made for the Department of Defense and this exception was an add-on over the House bill of the not-insigificant sum of $24.9 billion.

Now, Mr. President, I rather doubt that all the amendments which were held off this bill would even count for 10 percent of the add-on to the DOD section. There were many amendments dealing with domestic programs that merited the attention of the committee. All of these were kept off the bill in order to insure its passage in a timely manner. And at the same time, we added one amendment with a jump in annual funding rate of $24.9 billion.

When it comes to appropriations, there appears to be a double standard. Anything for defense, anytime, anywhere. Everybody else, stand in line.

We have a $200 billion deficit. Maybe $180 billion under optimistic conditions. But budgets in the $150 to $180 billion range, as far as the eye can see.

In my opinion, we cannot afford to treat defense and nondefense spending on this double standard. We must make sacrifices in both arenas. Both must be cut to reduce the deficit.

The problem is that we have some in our country who favor cutting defense and increasing domestic spending. And we have some who favor greatly increasing defense spending and drastically cutting domestic spending. But we have very few who argue that we must cut all programs—the ones we favor and the ones we disagree with; the ones that respond to constitutent appeals and the ones that affect some other constituency.

Until we have consistency in our approach to Federal spending, until we have the discipline to make reductions across-the-board regardless of our philosophical commitments, then spending will remain out of control.

The $24.9 billion committee amendment just proves that case.

There is another specific reason for supporting the House language for the Department of Defense. The House language stipulates, in precise terms, that the Congress should not be put in a position of funding programs that have not undergone congressional review. There is a compelling need for this language. In prior years, the Pentagon has liberally interpreted continuing resolution language as being binding only on the aggregate amounts funded in each appropriations category. The intent of Congress has been to restrict new program initiation or any other modification beyond the scope of previously approved levels.

Given the track record of the Department of Defense, the Congress has no choice but to specifically detail what is allowed and what is prohibited under continuing resolution funding. That has been done in the House language but it is absent from the Senate bill.

PROPOSED HATCH-HATFIELD COLLOQUY ON CONTINUING RESOLUTIONS

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I would like to ask the distinguished Senator from Oregon what the timetable is for the regular Labor-HHS appropriations measure. Do you expect it to come before the Senate in the next week or so?

Mr. HATFIELD. Yes; I would hope the Senate would consider the bill before the mid-October recess.

Mr. HATCH. In terms of the differences between the Senate and House continuing resolutions, as they now stand, does the Senator plan to resolve each of the literally hundreds of different figures separately, or does he plan to adopt a general principle for the conference, such as taking the lower figure of the two bills, or taking the current rate of funding?

Mr. HATFIELD. We plan to supply a general principle.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, as the distinguished Appropriations Committee chairman knows, I have an amendment prepared to the continuing resolution co-sponsored by Senators QUAYLE, HAWKINS, and KENNEDY, to increase funds for certain programs of the Job Training Partnership Act to at least current levels. There are differences in the House and Senate bills for these programs. Can the Senator give me his assurance that he will apply the principle of current level funding for this bill when the two resolutions are conferenced?

Mr. HATFIELD. That is a position we will go into conference with, and speaking for myself, one with which I am in sympathy, but of course the Senate conferees always try to uphold the Senate-passed position to the extent that we are able.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I understand the need for the unanimous consent agreement to not offer amendments to the continuing resolution, House Joint Resolution 367. I support that decision. However, I want to take this opportunity to draw my colleagues' attention to an amendment that would have been offered, if amendments had been permitted.

I was prepared to support Senator HATCH's amendment to maintain the current funding rate for training programs under the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) for the 45-day period of the continuing resolution or until enactment of the regular Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education appropriation. Under the continuing resolution as reported, the level for the basic job training program under (JTPA) would be $1.886 billion, compared to the fiscal year 1983 level of $2.181 billion for the comparable CETA (Comprehensive Employment and Training Act) program. The level for Job Corps would be reduced from $618 million to $553 million. The training programs for migrants and Indians would also be reduced.

This is the wrong time to cut job training funds: the problems of structural unemployment have not lessened. The business community is just getting involved in redesigning training programs. We give them the wrong signal by cutting the program before they have a chance to impact on it. Small businesses and large corporations have committeed themselves, both financially and personally, to the success of JTPA. Cutting the funding for JTPA is not a sign of support and confidence in the private sector.

The Job Corps is our most effective youth training program. It is just inefficient to reduce its level now when we know that this popular program enjoys such strong bipartisan support that it will be expanded again soon.

Training under the new program will be better training, training that will lead to real jobs. But better training is not cheaper training; the unit cost under JTPA is not lower than it was under CETA. The combined impact of cutting funds and increased training costs will be a significant reduction in the number of trainees that can participate.

I am pleased that in conference on the continuing resolution, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee is willing to support the general principle that the current rate will be used in cases where there are differences between the House and Senate figures. This will give us time to consider more carefully the full impact of funding reductions on these programs.

JTPA enjoyed strong, bipartisan support during its development and enactment. It passed the Senate unanimously. We do not want to jeopardize the success of JTPA. I believe it is important to send the private sector clear, unambiguous signs of support and confidence as they accept our challenge to make training programs for the disadvantaged a success.

EXTENSION OF THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank expires on September 30. It is the intention of Senator HEINZ to amend the FHA mortgage insurance extension to include a 30-day extension of the Bank's authority and I understand this extension is agreeable to the House. There has been some discussion about the possibility of extending the Bank's authority in the continuing resolution. Such action would, of course, more properly be a matter for the Banking Committee. I would therefore ask the distinguished floor manager of the continuing resolution whether it contains any language which would in any way extend the statutory authority of the Bank.

Mr. HATFIELD. I say to my good friend from Utah that the continuing resolution merely provides budget authority and guarantee authority for the Bank subject to existing statutes. It does not extend any statutory authority of the Bank which would otherwise expire.

Mr. GARN. I thank the chairman for his response.

CLINCH RIVER BREEDER REACTOR FUNDING

Mr. BAKER. I would like to inquire of the distinguished floor manager of the continuing resolution his understanding of the status of the funding for the Clinch River breeder reactor project. The regular energy and water development appropriation for fiscal year 1984 does not contain any new appropriated funds to continue the project. The Senate Appropriations Committee report for that measure indicated that appropriated funds for the project had not been included in the bill in light of the then pending development of an alternative financing proposal. Since that appropriations measure was enacted on July 14, 1983, the administration on August 1, 1983, formally transmitted an executive communication to the Congress submitting a proposal for a $1 billion alternative financing mechanism. To date, the Senate has not yet taken action on the necessary appropriations language to implement the proposal, although there have been hearings on the proposal in both the Senate and the House of Representatives. I note that this continuing resolution also does not contain any appropriated funding for the Clinch River breeder reactor project in fiscal year 1984. Consequently, I would like to ask the distinguished manager of this resolution as to the intended status of the project and the committee's intent for its funding pending final congressional action on the alternative financing proposal?

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank my colleague for his summary of the current situation regarding CRBR funding and his question about its status. The Appropriations Committee has deferred consideration, without prejudice, of additional funding for the CRBR project. By use of funds previously appropriated for CRBR but unobligated, or private contributions, the project should be continued so as to maintain all options of the Congress in considering the DOE's August 1, 1983, CRBRP alternative financing plan during the period of this continuing resolution. Furthermore, the Department should take no action with regards to project contracts, site preparation, manufacturing fabrication activities, engineering and design work, nuclear licensing proceedings with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, or any other project activity that would constrain or inhibit proceeding with the project with appropriated funds or alternative financing, should Congress act to continue funding for the project. Additionally, the Secretary should insure that any possible negative impact on existing or planned employment associated with the project is minimized to the maximum extent possible while Congress is considering the alternative financing proposal.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the distinguished manager of the resolution and I would hope that the Department of Energy will act promptly and aggressively to carry out the mandate articulated in his statement. It is imperative that the Secretary of Energy preserve the full scope of the project to the absolute maximum extent possible within available funds to insure that the ultimate will of the Congress can be pursued without any further impediments, should Congress act to continue the project.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, we have reached the point of third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the joint resolution.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do Senators yield back their time?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. STENNIS. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution having been read a third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 368) was passed.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. STENNIS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and request a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Chair appointed Messrs. HATFIELD, STEVENS, WEICKER, MCCLURE, LAXALT, COCHRAN, ABDNOR, KASTEN, STENNIS, PROXMIRE, INOUYE, HOLLINGS, EAGLETON, CHILES, and DECONCINI conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

RECON OPTICAL/CAI GAO REPORT

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, in April 1982, I addressed this body regarding a sole-source contract that the Navy was preparing to award for a low-altitude aerial reconnaissance camera for the RF-4B marine aircraft. I pointed out in my statement that:

> My extensive inquiries indicate strongly that the Navy is circumventing both competitive procurement procedures and U.S. industrial sources in acquiring this camera. It has created a purchase requirement that can be met only by a single foreign manufacturer, and it intends to buy the camera on an "urgent basis" from that manufacturer, to the detriment of U.S. workers and the domestic mobilization base.

Mr. President, the Navy had published an announcement on September 1, 1981, in the Commerce Business Daily, seeking suppliers for an off-the-shelf low altitude reconnaissance camera meeting a list of detailed specifications. No U.S. firm was able to respond, because of the specifications listed and the short 14-day period for response. The Navy had made a decision to procure these cameras for the RF-4B on a sole-source basis before test and delivery of the camera was complete and long before the U.S. companies were notified of the need for such a camera.

In a letter to me dated March 26, 1982, Assistant Secretary of the Navy George A. Sawyer, stated:

> There is not sufficient time to develop a camera from U.S. sources for use in the RF-4B before the end of the projected service life of the aircraft even if time permitted, we could not justify the expenditure of funds to develop such a camera when one has already been developed and can be procured off the shelf.

Mr. President, I strongly disagreed with that statement and pointed out that there was a U.S. company that could have acted on this requirement back in 1979, when the Navy first indicated a need for this type of camera. A company from my own State, CAI, a division of Recon/Optical, Inc., was prepared to develop a camera meeting the Navy's current requirements at its own expense if it was assured of a fair opportunity to compete.

Then, Mr. President, in December 1983, during consideration of 1983 defense appropriations legislation, my colleague, Senator PERCY, and I on behalf of Congressman CRANE, and after speaking to the other members of the Illinois delegation, offered an amendment that would have prohibited the use of funds for the procurement of this aerial reconnaissance camera until a report by the General Accounting Office had been submitted to Congress. This action was forced on us when the Navy would not agree to a competition between the American camera company and the Carl Zeiss Foundation of Germany. I pointed out during the debate, "The Navy's purchase request justifying procurement on a sole-source basis is complete with errors."

I indicated then that CAI was developing a camera, the CA810, at its own expense and that the Zeiss camera was not an off-the-shelf camera as the Navy purported. I urged the Navy to agree to hold an open and fair competition, because the first operational "off-the-shelf" camera from Zeiss was not to be delivered to the Marine Corps for 2 years.

Our amendment lost 48 to 46. However, Senator PERCY, Congressman CRANE, and I requested on behalf of ourselves and the Illinois delegation the General Accounting Office review the events leading to the Navy decision to award Zeiss Avionics Systems, Inc., of California, a marketing organization for the Carl Zeiss Foundation of Germany, a sole-source contract for 38 aerial reconnaissance cameras.

Mr. President, I have mentioned a few times on this floor my admiration for Secretary of the Navy Lehman, but I am going to quote a letter he wrote me on December 13, 1982, and that my good friend, Senator WARNER, had placed in the RECORD during our debate in December:

The Navy Department has worked hard for four years in a competitive environment to procure a camera that satisfies the Marine Corps low altitude camera requirement at lowest possible cost to the taxpayer.

The facts show that CAI Recon/Optical, Inc., was involved in the competitive process from the beginning. In 1978, the Navy began to work with industry—including CAI—to improve the performance of low altitude cameras. CAI was fully aware of Navy's interest and met with Navy on numerous occasions during 1978 and 1979 to discuss how their KS-87B might be modified for low altitude use. The Navy even put funds in the budget to cover expected modification costs. However, CAI chose not to pursue the photo system development. Zeiss Avionics on the other hand invested their own funds to modify an existing off-the-shelf KA-107 camera to meet the USMC need. This development effort proved successful and later testing verified that the camera meets requirements. Even after we determined that the modified Zeiss camera was satisfactory, in September, 1981, the Navy announced by Commerce Business Daily (CBD) the intent to produce a low altitude camera, CAI did not respond to the CBD announcement or ask for additional time to respond.

Mr. President, the GAO's final report was given to Senator PERCY, Congressman CRANE, Senator WARNER, and me on September 22, 1983. In it, the GAO found that the Navy:

Did not seek the participation of alternative suppliers as provided by the Armed Services Procurement Act (10 U.S.C. 2304(G)) and defense acquisition regulations (DAR 1-300.1 and 3-101(d) and (the Navy) worked exclusively with Zeiss to develop a camera, which resulted in Zeiss being the only supplier that could have reasonably been expected to respond to a source solicitation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the September 22, 1983, General Accounting Office report be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE,
Washington, D.C., September 22, 1983.

Hon. ALAN J. DIXON,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR DIXON: In response to your December 21, 1982, request, we reviewed the events leading to the Navy's decision to award Zeiss Avionics Systems, Inc.,[1] a $10 million, multiyear, sole-source contract for 38 aerial reconnaissance cameras to be used in the Marine Corps RF-4B reconnaissance aircraft. The contract, awarded on November 16, 1982, provides for the total Marine Corps requirement.

We found that the Navy—

Did not seek the participation of alternative suppliers as provided by the Armed Services Procurement Act (10 U.S.C. 2304(g)) and Defense Acquisition Regulations, (DAR 1-300.1 and 3-101(d)) and Worked exclusively with Zeiss to develop a camera, which resulted in Zeiss being the only supplier that could have reasonably been expected to respond to a source solicitation.

In response to a draft of this report, the Department of Defense concluded that the lack of documentation to support the Navy's assertions gives rise to an appearance of bias (see app. III). As requested, we obtained information on the questions you originally posed to the Navy and attached to your request (see app. II.). A chronology of events leading to the sole-source award is shown in appendix I.

SCOPE AND METHODOLOGY

Rather than assessing each element of the sole-source justification, we compared the Navy's actions leading up to the procurement with actions that should have been taken had the Navy adhered to the Defense Acquisition Regulations providing for competition in defense procurement.

We interviewed officials and reviewed various files applicable to the procurement at the following organizations: (1) the Reconnaissance and Photographic Systems Division of the Naval Air Systems Command which was responsible for coordinating the procurement, (2) the Naval Air Rework Facility, North Island, California, which tested the Zeiss Cameras, (3) the Naval Supply Center, San Diego, California, which was responsible for contract administration, (4) the Air Force Air Logistic Center, Hill Air Force Base, Ogden, Utah, which conducted the laboratory tests of the Zeiss cameras and awarded the final contract, and (5) Headquarters, Marine Corps, which was responsible for generating the requirement. We also met with officials of CAI to determine the availability of documentation regarding their communications with the Navy. We confirmed information obtained from the Navy with officials of Zeiss Avionics, Inc. Our review was made in accordance with generally accepted government audit standards.

NAVY DID NOT SEEK ALTERNATIVE SUPPLIER PARTICIPATION

According to the Marine Corps requirements officer, in 1976, the Marine Corps changed the tactics it had been using to carry out its photographic reconnaissance mission. The Marine Corps believed that survivability and mission success were improved by flying very low and fast during reconnaissance missions when surface to air missiles were a threat.

The Marine Corps had been using two cameras, the KS-87B and KA-56, for low altitude reconnaissance. The KS-87B is produced by CAI and the KA-56 is produced by Fairchild. Both suppliers have produced reconnaissance cameras for the Navy for many years and are considered by the Navy to be the major U.S. suppliers of such cameras. However, in December 1978, the Navy decided that neigher the KA-56 nor the KS-87B provided the capability needed for a very low and fast reconnaissance mission. The KA-56 is a panoramic camera, which is subject to distortion, and therefore, it was judged unsuitable. The KS-87B had been in use for some time and the Navy believed it did not provide sufficient resolution or area coverage.

The Reconnaissance and Photographic Systems Division of the Naval Air Systems Command (NAVAIR-547) is responsible for initiating programs for procuring cameras to meet the Marine Corps needs. In response to the new requirement, NAVAIR-547 began looking for a camera with the capability needed for low and fast reconaissance missions. According to the NAVAIR-547 technical specialist who coordinated this project, Zeiss was the only manufacturer with a camera that appeared to have the capability of filling the need. He told us that Zeiss had developed two cameras under North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) contracts, a KA-107A used for low altitude reconnaissance and a KA-108 for stand-off reconnaissance. He also told us that he knew CAI and Fairchild did not have new reconnaissance cameras because of his routine contracts with these firms.

The technical specialist said he did not specifically discuss with either CAI or Fairchild the Navy's need or plan to buy a new camera to satisfy the requirement. Further, he decided the requirement was too small to justify development by the Navy. He also did not discuss with either supplier whether it would be interested in undertaking a development effort with its own funds to meet this specific need. Using this as his rationale, the technical specialist initiated the process that culminated in the sole-source award to Zeiss.

While we believe it was appropriate for the Navy to consider Zeiss, the Navy's decision not to contact other suppliers (CAI and Fairchild) to at least verify that they were not interested in funding their own development was not in accordance with the provision of the Armed Services Procurement Act (10 U.S.C. 2304(g)) and the Defense Acquisition Regulations (DAR 1-300.1 and 3-101(d)), that specify the use of competition to the maximum extent practical. Had the Navy adhered to this requirement, it would have advised these suppliers of its needs and provided them with an opportunity to decide whether or not they wanted to compete. Further, by obtaining their responses the Navy would have been in a better position to decide whether competition or a sole-source award was more appropriate.

THE NAVY'S ACTIONS FAVORED ZEISS

DAR 3-106.2(C), 3-504.2(C), and 3-507.2(b) require that potential suppliers be treated equitably. However, between December 1978 when the Navy asked the Marine Corps to flight test Zeiss cameras and September 1981 when it publicly announced the Marine Corps requirement, the Navy took actions that put Zeiss in a position of being the only supplier that could reasonably be expected to respond to the source solicitation.

It did this in two ways. First, it worked exclusively with Zeiss to develop a new camera, and second, it waited until a prototype of that camera had been tested before it publicly announced its requirements for an off-the-shelf camera.

Advance information led to the development of a new camera

In September 1978, NAVAIR-547 made arrangements with the North Island Naval Air

[1] Zeiss Avionics Systems, Inc., of California is a marketing organization for the Carl Zeiss Foundation of Germany. Zeiss Avionics was established to sell and distribute Zeiss cameras in the United States.

Rework Facility to prepare and conduct the tests of two reconnaissance cameras, the Zeiss KA-107A and KA-108. The KA-107A is a tri-lens, low altitude camera with a mechanical film drive. The KA-108 is a single lens, stand-off camera with an electronic film drive. The tests are part of the process required to obtain approval for service use which must be obtained before any camera can be purchased. In March 1979, the Navy awarded Zeiss a contract (NOO123-79-C-0495) for the two cameras to be used in the test and evaluation to be conducted by North Island.

In January 1980, to further expedite the approval for service use, the Navy wrote and asked Zeiss for test results it had obtained while performing the NATO contracts. In that letter, the Navy stated:

"* * * As you are aware the Navy program plans for the KA-107C and KA-108A cameras to be delivered under contract NOO123-79-C-0495 lead to procurement in quantity in FY82, for the RF-4B application * * *.

Apparently, Zeiss was made aware of the Navy's plan before January 1980. Also, the letter indicated that the Navy planned to begin buying Zeiss cameras in 1982.

Because of a minor change in wiring, the KA-107A camera provided to the Navy for testing was designated the KA-107C. Testing of the KA-107C began in June 1980. During the tests, Zeiss engineers observed that the Marine Corps was pleased with the quality of the photography but was concerned about the speed at which the camera advanced film. The Zeiss engineers concluded that the Marine Corps wanted a faster film advance than that offered by the KA-107C.

Earlier, in May 1980, Zeiss had briefed the Navy about future plans for an electronic drive camera system. The Navy was, therefore, aware that Zeiss had plans for a new camera. Accordingly, the Navy and Zeiss met in August 1980 to discuss the possibility of a new camera. Then in September 1980, before tests of the KA-107C were completed, Zeiss submitted a proposal to define the new camera, which combined features of the KA-107C and the KA-108. Despite these changes the proposed new camera was still referred to as the KA-107C.

In the meantime, the tests were completed on the original KA-107C. The test report concluded that this camera met the Marine Corps' operational requirement and recommended that it be procured. According to the officials at the North Island Naval Air Rework Facility, who conducted the test and evaluation, the camera performed as well or better than claimed. They stated the film advance problem was caused by a failure in the RF-4B to provide the camera with accurate speed and altitude data and was not a problem in the camera. Notwithstanding the test results, the Marine Corps stated it preferred the new camera, which had an electronic film drive, rather than the mechanical KA-107C.

In November 1980, the Commanding General of the Third Marine Aircraft Wing requested purchase of what he called the electronically cycled KA-107C, which, in effect, was the camera Zeiss had proposed in September 1980. In December 1980, a representative of the North Island Naval Air Rework Facility went to Germany to discuss the proposed camera with Zeiss officials and to reach an agreement on its specifications. The Navy approach had thus evolved from testing the existing KA-107A and KA-108 to developing a new hybrid camera with Zeiss.

The Navy deferred public announcement until the new camera was developed and tested

Rather than publicly announcing the requirement for a new camera at this time (November, 1980), the Navy decided to get approval for service use for the new camera by modifying the scope of the existing contract. The modification included the agreed upon specifications for the new camera, although still called the KA-107C, and provided data necessary to fulfill the requirement for approval for service use.

Normally, when a modification of an item results in a material change in the scope of a contract, the item should be competitively procured. The Navy, however, chose to treat this effort as a continuation of its evaluation of the KA-107C camera. It said the technology for the modified camera existed in the KA-107C and KA-108 cameras. Our review confirmed this. However, the changes worked out between the Navy and Zeiss resulted in a substantially different camera.

The new camera was not off-the-shelf equipment. An off-the-shelf item, according to DAR 14.001.7, is one produced and placed in stock by a contractor before receiving orders for the item. Therefore, because the camera did not exist at this point, it was not an off-the-shelf item.

By approaching this as a continuation of its original evaluation, the Navy deferred public announcement of its requirement for the new camera until September 1, 1981, when it issued a solicitation. This was the first public disclosure by the Navy of its requirement. The solicitation stated that the Navy was looking for suppliers with "off-the-shelf" equipment that met what are essentially the specifications of the new Zeiss camera. It also stated that responses were to address all conditions in the solicitation and provide certification by either government or independent laboratory of all claims regarding performance. Zeiss was the only supplier to respond to the solicitation. It was quite unlikely that any other suppliers would have a camera meeting those specifications because the Navy had been working exclusively with Zeiss to define the new camera.

CURRENT STATUS OF THE CAMERA PROCUREMENT

On December 13, 1982, the Secretary of the Navy wrote to Senator Dixon and stated "* * * Assuming CAI or another contractor develops a camera that satisfies the [Marine Corps'] RF-4B requirements, the Navy will welcome competition to satisfy these future requirements * * *."

The Navy, however, had awarded a multiyear contract on November 16, 1982, to Zeiss for 38 cameras, the Marine Corps total requirement. The contract provides funding for 10 cameras in fiscal year 1982, 8 in fiscal year 1983, 14 in fiscal year 1984, and 6 in fiscal year 1985.

In compliance with the Secretary's commitment, NAVAIR-547 published a source solicitation in the Commerce Business Daily during the week of July 4, 1983. The solicitation called for prospective suppliers to submit two cameras for evaluation. The evaluation will determine if the cameras perform as claimed and if approval for service use can be obtained. Zeiss is expected to submit a letter stating its cameras have been subjected to evaluation.

The Navy intends to complete the evaluation by October 15, 1983. If any of the cameras pass the evaluation and are considered competitors to the Zeiss cameras, the Navy will conduct a competition. If Zeiss loses out in the competition, the Navy will terminate that portion of the November 16, 1982, contract governing the 1984 and 1985 requirements of 20 cameras. If termination action is taken, the Navy will have to pay termination charges.

CONCLUSIONS

The Navy did not determine the willingness of potential suppliers to participate and worked exclusively with Zeiss. These actions are contrary to regulations requiring the use of competition of the maximum extent practical. Further, NAVAIR-547 disclosed specific requirements and procurement plans to Zeiss that it did not provide to U.S. suppliers. These actions are also contrary to the regulations requiring equitable treatment of potential suppliers.

NAVAIR's public announcement of its requirements and the specifications to be met by potential suppliers took place after a Zeiss prototype had been developed, delivered, and tested. These specifications were essentially those agreed to by NAVAIR-547 and Zeiss for the new camera. As a result, Zeiss was the only supplier that could have reasonably been expected to respond to the source solicitation.

We are also sending this report today to Senator Charles H. Percy and Representative Philip M. Crane. As arranged with your office, we are sending copies of this report to Senator Warner. Unless you publicly announce its contents earlier, we plan no further distribution of this report until 10 days from the date of the report. At that time we will send copies to interested parties and make copies available to others upon request.

Sincerely yours,

Director, National Security and International Affairs Division.

APPENDIX II.—INFORMATION ON THE QUESTIONS ATTACHED TO THE REQUEST

As requested, we are providing information that is relevant to some of the 18 questions you originally addressed to the Navy. We have used the same number for each question that was used in your original request.

Question 3: Why did naval personnel state to representatives of CAI Recon/Optical in the Spring of 1979 that the sole purpose of the initial acquisition of the Zeiss KA-107 camera was an unsolicited routine technical evaluation directed at no specific requirement?

Repsonse: We cannot provide a definitive answer to what was or was not said during discussions between the Navy and CAI. Although NAVAIR-547 officials denied making such a statement, they could not provide any documentation (i.e., minutes of meetings, memoranda of records, or informal notes) to indicate that they had not. Similarly, CAI officials could not provide documentation indicating they had made specific inquiries.

Question 4: Was there collusion between naval personnel and Zeiss to the exclusion of U.S. industry?

Response: We did not find evidence of collusion or conflict of interest. However, as discussed in the report, we did find that the Navy's actions precluded U.S. camera manufacturers from a fair chance to decide whether they wanted to compete.

Question 5: What is the Navy's justification for (a) awarding to Zeiss in July 1980, a $320,000 sole source contract for an automatic test set for the KA-107/KA-108 cameras, and (b) developing with Zeiss and approving in April 1981 an Integrated Logistics Support Plan for the KA-107C camera, when the Navy admits the Marine Corps formal request for a new camera was not made until June 1981?

Response: (a) The $320,000 contract awarded in July 1980 was for the development of a universal test set that could test all cameras. These test sets are being purchased under the November 1982 camera contract. However, we found that in June 1979, Zeiss submitted an unsolicited proposal for unique test equipment to the NAVAIR-547 technical specialist who then sent it to the North Island Naval Air Rework Facility. The unique test equipment could only be used to test the KA-107 and KA-108 cameras. In August 1979, Zeiss awarded a letter contract to TRICOR Systems, Incorporated, its subcontractor, to begin development of the unique test equipment. Between August 1979 and July 1980, an official of the Naval Air Rework Facility advised Zeiss that the Navy was interested in the universal test set, not in the unique test equipment. Zeiss then advised TRICOR that its development should lead to a universal set. The Navy then awarded the July 1980 sole-source contract to Zeiss for the development of the universal test set.

(b) An integrated logistics support plan is required for all procurements. Usually, a support plan is not prepared until the requirement has been formally approved. However, the process of obtaining formal approval for the operational requirement (the camera) was initiated by the Commanding Officer of the Marine Corps reconnaisance squadron located in El Toro, California, in March 1980. In fact, a draft of the requirement had been provided to the North Island Naval Air Rework Facility in September 1979 to aid it in planning the test and evaluation of the KA-107 and KA-108 cameras scheduled for May 1980. The Commanding Officer forwarded the operational requirement to the Commanding General, Third Marine Aircraft Wing, for endorsement. The Commanding General approved the requirement in April 1980 and submitted it to the Commandant, Headquarters, Marine Corps. Since the Commandant did not approve the requirement until June 1981, there was a delay of 14 months. One reason for this delay, according to one Marine Corps headquarters official, was that the requirement was misplaced. Another headquarters official stated that if the approval took 14 months, the requirement probably did not have a high priority. Since the process of obtaining approval for the operational requirement was initiated in March 1980, it appears NAVAIR-547 obtained agreement with Zeiss on a support plan under the assumption that formal approval would subsequently be obtained.

Question 12: Why did the Navy proceed without informing Congressional representatives as the Navy had promised to do with further flight tests of the Zeiss camera in September 1982, when Assistant Secretary Pyatt explicitly stated to the Congressional delegation that there would be no further activity of any kind on this procurement until the delegation's questions were resolved?

Response: NAVAIR-547 officials believed that the Assistant Secretary meant no further procurement action would be taken and that this agreement did not extend to flight test activity. These officials stated that funds had already been committed for the September 1982 flight test.

Question 13: In the Determination and Findings (D&F) required by the Armed Services Procurement Act of 1947 and the implementing Defense Acquisition Regulation, what basis is cited as justifying a sole source procurement to Zeiss? When was the D&F signed? By whom?

Response: There were two D&Fs prepared for the camera procurement. One D&F, dated April 12, 1982, justified awarding a multiyear contract on a sole-source basis. It was signed by Paul H. Reid, Contracting Officer, and approved by Colonel Alan R. Williamson, Director, Contracting and Manufacturing, Ogden Air Logistics Center, Ogden, Utah. The D&F states "(ii) the items are expected to be obtainable only from a sole source, Zeiss Avionics Systems, Inc. during the entire multiyear period. (See attached sole source justification.)" The sole-source justification referred to was a Navy Military Interdepartmental Purchase Request (MIPR).

Because the Air Force is the buyer of all aerial reconnaissance cameras for the Department of Defense, the Navy submitted a MIPR to the Air Force, requesting the procurement and justifying the sole-source award to Zeiss. Air Force personnel did not question the sole-source justification even though reconnaissance cameras had been purchased for many years from CAI and this was Zeiss's first contract, they said that they do not normally question Navy MIRP's however, they agreed it would have been appropriate to do so.

The sole-source justification relied on by the Air Force states: "* * * the sole source procurement of the K-107C is justified based on (a) the absence of an alternate supplier of the type camera required, (b) the dollar value of the procurement versus the cost of RDT&E plus procurement, and (c) the small force level (i.e. 28 A/C) and programmed service life of the host aircraft, the RF-4B. (RDT&E would not result in the delivery of a production item until the RF-4B phase out.* * *"

The second D&F, dated October 12, 1982, was signed by James C. McCowan, Contracting Officer, and approved by Captain Debra A. Blagg, Chief Photographic Section, Directorate of Contracting and Manufacturing, Ogden Air Logistics Center. This D&F justified using the negotiation method of procurement instead of formal advertising.

When we asked why Paul H. Reid did not remain the contracting officer through contract award, Air Force officials stated that he was transferred to another group.

Question 14: Why is the Navy continuing to insist that only the KA-107C camera meets the RF-4B requirements, knowing of the problems with the Zeiss camera, when CAI can produce a competitive camera satisfying the Navy's publicly stated criteria and meeting the Navy's announced production delivery schedule?

Response: The Navy is not buying the original KA-107 but rather a KS-153A that Zeiss specifically designed to meet Navy/

Marines Corps' needs. As explained on page 5 the Navy's approach evolved from testing the existing KA-107C and KA-108 cameras to developing a new camera with Zeiss. The Navy referred to this new camera as a KA-107C. However, the Air Force, in preparing the justifications for a sole-source contract award to Zeiss, designated the camera as KS-153A.

As to whether CAI can produce a competitive camera, the Navy has stated that it will hold a competition if CAI produces a camera that meets the stated criteria.

Question 17: With respect to the Navy's assertion that the sole source contract with Zeiss Avionics captures the majority of total price for U.S. business and provides for production expansion and technology transfer to Tricor Systems, Inc. located in Dundee, Illinois, has the Navy satisfied itself that such offers are credible?

Response: As indicated earlier (see questions 5), Zeiss and has awarded Tricor a letter contract for test equipment in August 1979, earlier than your inquiries. The Navy provided data indicating U.S. suppliers would receive about 57 percent of the total contract price and Zeiss of Germany would receive about 43 percent ($5,130,000). Of this amount, $700,000 is for materials and camera components purchased from U.S. vendors. The camera is produced and/or assembled 100 percent by Zeiss of Germany. The remainder of the contract price, about $5,000,000, is for subcontracts awarded by Zeiss Avionics of California to U.S. suppliers. The data, as presented, assumes the currency fluctuation provision contained in the contract will have no impact on payments.

We did not verify the data because it was received late in our review.

Question 18: Has the Navy at any time disclosed sensitive or classified information to Zeiss Avionics, a company owned and controlled by the Carl Zeiss Foundation of Germany?

Response: NAVAIR-547 officials, North Island Naval Air Rework Facility personnel, and the contracting officers said that there was no classified information relating to the contract. In addition, we did not observe any classified information or documents during the course of our review.

APPENDIX III

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., August 18, 1983.

Mr. FRANK C. CONAHAN,
Director, National Security and International Affairs Division, U.S. General Accounting Office, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CONAHAN: This is the Department of Defense (DOD) response to your letter to the Secretary of Defense transmitting the General Accounting Office (GAO) draft report, "Sole Source Award of a Contract for Aerial Reconnaissance Cameras to Zeiss Avionics Systems, Inc.," (GAO Code No. 942241/OSD Case No. 6307).

Based on DoD's review of this procurement, it has been concluded that while no illegalities have occurred, the lack of documentation to support the Navy's assertions gives rise to an appearance of bias. Accordingly, the Navy will be requested to investigate the adequacy of its guidance to nonprocurement personnel on the preferred means of conducting engineering development and requirements definition activities involving the private sector and to take any necessary corrective action.

The Navy and all other procuring activities will be advised that in the future, for any procurement where there is an appearance of bias and the acquisition record cannot be adequately documented, the case will be thoroughly evaluated with a view toward possible cancellation.

Your interest in bringing this matter to our attention is appreciated.

Sincerely,

JAMES P. WADE, Jr.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the GAO concluded that the Navy did not look beyond Zeiss for other suppliers, that the Navy gave specific information to Zeiss and not to U.S. suppliers, that the Navy's so-called Commerce Business Daily's September 1981, announcement took place after Zeiss' prototype had been developed, delivered, and tested. Therefore, Zeiss was the only supplier that could submit a bid.

The Acting Under Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering Lane P. Wade, Jr., in a letter to the GAO which appears in appendix III of the GAO report states:

The lack of documentation to support the Navy's assertion gives rise to an appearance of bias.

He further states—

The Navy and all other procuring activities will be advised that in the future, for any procurement where there is an appearance of bias and the acquisition record cannot be adequately documented, the case will be thoroughly evaluated with a view toward possible cancellation.

Mr. President, the draft of this report was circulated early in July. At that time Senator PERCY, Congressman CRANE, and I spoke with Secretary Lehman. He advised us that after reading the GAO draft report he had directed that a second Commerce Business Daily source solicitation be published which would seek sources by October for low-altitude aerial reconnaissance cameras to be supplied to the Navy. The prototype cameras will be evaluated and if the cameras pass the evaluation and are considered competition to the Zeiss camera, there will be a direct competition for the fiscal year 1984 and 1985 requirement of 20 cameras. I applaud the Secretary for his actions and I point out that much of what went on regarding the Zeiss contract prior to the September 1981 Commerce Business Daily notification was before his stewardship as Secretary of the Navy. I would also like to point out that the GAO staff complimented the Navy on its cooperation with them during this investigation.

But, Mr. President, I would suggest to Secretary Lehman that he take one further step if a camera is submitted to the Navy and that camera meets or exceeds all specifications. The Secretary should cancel the existing contract with Zeiss and initiate a new procurement which would be for all 38 cameras.

For if a different camera manufacturer wins the fiscal year 1984-85 procurement it would mean the Marine Corps would be forced to establish training systems, spare parts inventories, maintenance programs for two different cameras in the same operational organization. The first Zeiss camera is not due to be delivered for another year or more.

Also, we are not talking of 38 cameras just for the Marines. This camera can be used by the Navy itself and possibly the Air Force. I sincerely hope Secretary Lehman will consider rebidding all 38 cameras. Senator PERCY, Congressman CRANE, and I will be sending a letter to Secretary Lehman suggesting just such a cancellation.

Mr. President, it has been suggested by some that the entire Illinois delegation "were pork barreling on behalf of an Illinois concern." We fought this $11 million contract because we want our companies and every State's companies to have a chance to bid openly on projects.

The Navy's reliance on a sole-source contract in this case is representative of the approach used all too often by Federal procurement offices. Sole-source procurements are not evil per se, but when they become so prevalent that competition is cutoff, then, Mr. President, our Nation's economy suffers, our national defense suffers, and the taxpayers suffer.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, both Senator DIXON and I are taking the opportunity this morning to report to the Senate on a matter we originally raised late last year. This is, in a sense, a progress report because the entire matter has yet to run its course.

On December 8, 1982, during debate on the continuing resolution, my distinguished colleague and I offered an amendment which would have prohibited the Navy from proceeding with a sole-source contract for aerial reconnaissance cameras for the RF-4 fighter. We wanted the Navy to wait until the General Accounting Office (GAO) had had an opportunity to conduct a review of the contract award. Senator DIXON and I attempted to point out to the Senate that the circumstances surounding this particular contract raised serious questions about the propriety of the contract award—circumstances which we felt warranted the full scrutiny of the GAO.

It is, therefore, with a sense of vindication, but also with deep disappointment and sadness, that we report the results of the General Accounting Office review of the events which led up to the Navy's decision to award Zeiss Avionics Systems, Inc., a $10 million, multiyear, sole-source contract for 38 aerial reconnaissance cameras.

I realize that $10 million spread over 3 years is not that much money to a defense establishment accustomed to spending billions and billions of dollars every year. Apparently, the Department of the Navy considers this loose change, small peanuts. But the principle involved here goes to the heart of a debate which has been raging in this country for the past several years—how much money does the Defense Department really need to adequately and cost effectively maintain our vital defenses? I can assure my colleagues that if this kind of sloppy, deceitful, and arrogant procurement had occurred in a company that I was responsible for running, heads would roll.

Let me quote from the GAO report:

We found that the Navy did not seek the participation of alternative suppliers as provided by the Armed Services Procurement Act and Defense Acquisition Regulations, and worked exclusively with Zeiss to develop a camera, which resulted in Zeiss being the only supplier that could have reasonably been expected to respond to a source solicitation.

In other words, Mr. President, a sweetheart deal for a foreign camera company.

Senator DIXON, Congressman PHIL CRANE, and I met with the Secretary of the Navy almost 1 year ago. We urged him then to agree to halt the sole-source procurement and to have in effect a "fly-off" competition between the German camera and one developed by CAI Recon/Optical, of Barrington, Ill., which originally brought this matter to the attention of the Illinois delegation. It is unfortunate that it has taken 12 months for the Department of the Navy—following reams of correspondence, numerous meetings, legislative action and now the results of a GAO investigation—to essentially agree to the very terms we had urged on them originally. Our only objective through months of negotiation has been to secure fair and honest competition in this procurement. We pursued this matter because we believe in competitive bidding and the savings it can produce, and because the Navy said one thing but did another.

I want to pay particular tribute to my colleagues, Senator DIXON and Congressman PHIL CRANE, who never waivered in their determination to see this matter through. In addition, my staff has worked closely with Mr. Dave Allen, formerly of Congressman CRANE's staff, and with Charles Smith of Senator DIXON's staff.

We are all extremely pleased that the Navy has now agreed to allow CAI Recon/Optical to submit a camera for this particular procurement. It will be tested equally against the German Zeiss camera. The best camera will then be awarded the balance of the contract award. This is the fairest and most proper way to handle this matter. My only regret is that it took this long to happen.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CARL YASTRZEMSKI

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have two things. First, let me say that what I am about to do has been cleared with the minority leader, with Senator KENNEDY, the principal sponsor, and the Senators on our side. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 232, which is Calendar Order No. 438, a resolution in honor of Carl Yastrzemski.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the resolution by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 2327) in honor of Carl Yastrzemski and the Boston Red Sox.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this weekend, Carl Yastrzemski plays in his final baseball game for the Boston Red Sox.

All of us in Massachusetts will miss him, and so will the Nation. No one has played more major league games than Yaz. No one has matched the consistency and quality of his performance, no one has matched his team leadership, and no one has matched his sportsmanship.

Yaz leaves the game as one of the all time greats in hits and in the hearts of Boston fans. He earned seven Gold Gloves for his extraordinary fielding prowess, and he was selected to play in 18 all-star games in his brilliant career.

Patrolling the outfield, he was the master of the legendary "Green Monster"—the left field wall in Fenway Park that has played havoc with even the best of other fielders in the game.

In a recent article, William Nack of Sports Illustrated told how Carl Yastrzemski played "the Green Monster like a fiddle, quite literally by ear." The bottom 15 feet of the wall was then cement. As Yaz said:

When you heard it hit the cement wall, you stayed back a ways because it came off there hard. Above the cement, you had squares of tin with rivets in them. If the ball hit the tin, it made a thud, and the ball dropped straight down. If it hit the rivets, it could do anything, come straight down, shoot to the side.

But wherever the ball fell, Yaz could always field it and throw a runner out.

Most of all for Boston, it was Yaz who led the Cardiac Kids to the "impossible dream" of the American League Pennant in 1967.

The famous poem by Ernest Lawrence Thayer, a son of Massachusetts, helps convey the extraordinary sense of loss we feel over his retirement. Perhaps we may be forgiven now for adapting the poet's words to this occasion:

Oh! somewhere in this favored land the Sun is shining bright,
The band is playing somewhere, and somewhere hearts are light;
And somewhere men are laughing, and somewhere children shout,
But there is no joy in Fenway—mighty Yaz is bowing out.

For all of us who ever saw him play, and millions more whose hearts he won, Yaz will always be remembered as a winner. I am proud today to offer this Senate resolution in tribute to one of the greatest baseball figures who ever played the game, Carl Yastrzemski of the Boston Red Sox.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S Res. 232) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. RES. 232

Whereas Carl Yastrzemski will soon complete his twenty-third and final season as a baseball player for the Boston Red Sox;

Whereas Carl Yastrzemski has played in more major league baseball games than any other player in the history of the sport;

Whereas "Captain Carl" won baseball's honored triple crown and led his Cardiac Kids to the "Impossible Dream" of an American League Pennant in 1967; and

Whereas "Yaz" will be remembered always as one of the finest players in baseball history and a leader of great compassion and ability both on and off the field: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States of America joins with the people of Massachusetts and sport fans throughout the World in honoring Carl Yastrzemski for his outstanding career, his outstanding sportsmanship, and his outstanding contribution to baseball and the Nation.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am happy to say that apparently, we can go to the Federal supplemental compensation bill, which is S. 1887. The distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee is here. The distinguished ranking minority member is here.

I belatedly wish the ranking member a happy birthday on yesterday and say facetiously, somewhat, that the banquet last night was to celebrate not only his birthday but his long service as chairman of the Finance Committee. May I say I mean to ask the minority leader who it was that ever convinced RUSSELL LONG he is not still chairman of the committee.

Mr. President, he says it is not his birthday. I am tempted to take the remarks out of the record, but in deference to the enormous respect I have for the Senator from Louisiana, I shall not.

FEDERAL SUPPLEMENTAL COMPENSATION AMENDMENTS OF 1983

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to consideration of Calendar Order No. 404, S. 1887.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1887) to extend the Federal supplemental compensation program for 18 months, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, may I say that the managers are here and prepared to proceed. This is one of those measures that must be done before midnight tomorrow night. That means not just the Senate, but through the conference and adoption by both Houses and the Secretary of the Treasury. I think, therefore, it is important that we try to finish this bill tonight. I do not intend to ask the Senate to stay very late, but if we can finish this bill by 6 p.m., we ought to do that, and I think we can. Tomorrow, then, can be given over to the conference and acting on the conference report.

May I say to all Senators who may be listening in their offices, especially to my friends who are managers on both sides, that we earnestly urge them to try to finish this bill evening.

Once again, I have obtained the clearance of the minority leader in respect to this request. I think he concurs and I recommend that others concur in the action.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I rise to urge my colleagues to support S. 1887, the Federal Supplemental Compensation Amendments of 1983. This bill was reported by the Finance Committee on Thursday, September 22. Quick action is essential to continue the payment of Federal supplemental compensation benefits beyond the current expiration date of September 30.

The bill contains other timely provisions which received strong support in the committee. First, the bill provides for a 1-year extension of an important foster care voluntary placement funding provision which would otherwise end on September 30. Additionally, this bill contains an increase in the entitlement level for the Title XX: Social Services Block Grant. This increase of $200 million is effective for fiscal year 1984 and brings the funding level for the social services block grant to $2.7 billion.

The Federal supplemental compensation (FSC) program provides emergency benefits to Americans experiencing prolonged periods of unemployment. Unless Congress acts without delay, the program will expire. Benefits currently being paid under the program will not cease totally on October 1 as there is a phaseout feature which permits present recipients to receive up to one-half of the remaining weeks of benefits to which they are entitled. However, this phaseout does nothing for individuals becoming newly entitled to FSC benefits. Only an extension, passed by both Houses and signed by the President, can assure that these important payments will continue.

On September 13, the Reagan administration announced its strong support for an 18-month extension of the FSC program. On September 15, the Secretary of Labor, Ray Donovan, appeared before the full Finance Committee to describe the administration plan and to assure the committee of the President's support for an FSC extension, within certain responsible fiscal limits. Since September 15, I have met with the Secretary and with the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, Dave Stockman, to discuss the FSC program and its entension. The staff of the Finance Committee, minority and majority, worked with staff of the Secretary and the Director to develop the proposal eventually approved by the Finance Committee. I am convinced that this proposal is sound, both on policy and fiscal grounds.

BACKGROUND

The FSC program was part of last year's Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act. Unemployed individuals began receiving benefits under the program on September 12, 1982. The Surface Transportation Assistance Act, last December, increased the maximum number of weeks available in the States and increased individual entitlements. Finally, the Social Security Amendment of 1983 reauthorized the FSC program for 6 months, through September 30. Additional weeks of benefits were again provided for the program's so-called exhaustees.

FEDERAL SUPPLEMENTAL COMPENSATION AMENDMENTS OF 1983

S. 1887, the Finance Committee bill, would extend the FSC program for 18 months. No additional benefits are provided to those who have exhausted earlier entitlements, recognizing that providing unemployment benefits of up to 65 weeks in as many as 21 States, represents the outer limits of what we can expect on unemployment program to provide. The Department of Labor estimates the program's cost to be $3.7 billion. The Congressional Budget Office cost estimate is $2.595 billion. The Labor Department also estimates that benefits would be paid to approximately 3.8 million individuals during the period of October 1, 1983 to March 31, 1985.

The Finance Committee bill recognizes the fiscal restraints we face. The administration has proposed a generous, responsible extension. The Finance Committee program while exceeding the administration level of $3.16 billion, is still within the acceptable range. The American taxpayers have already made a significant contribution to the Nation's unemployed. The FSC program will have paid benefits of at least $5.6 billion to approximately 5 million individuals.

The Finance Committee bill takes account of the special problems facing States which have experienced prolonged periods of unemployment. Rather than introducing a never before used and statistically unsound measure (total unemployment rate) as the House bill has done, the Finance Committee bill permits an alternative calculation based on the insured unemployment rate—a real measure of the number of individuals eligible for benefits. If the insured unemployment rate for a State equals or exceeds 6 percent when averaged over the period since January 1982, that State will qualify for the maximum duration of benefits (12 weeks). This provision recognizes the seriousness of long-term unemployment in the States which were first to enter the recession and have been slower to experience recovery.

The Finance Committee bill provides a rational restructuring of the FSC program. An extension of 18 months introduces a greater degree of certainty for both the claimants and for the administrators of the program. Many of you have heard from the employment security agencies in your States regarding the complexity of the current program. S. 1887 would set benefit duration levels for a 13-week period. In the 18-month program, then, the duration levels would be redetermined only five times. This would eliminate the current situation in which a number of States have had to redetermine individual entitlements as many as 10 times.

Mr. President, at this point, I set forth for in the RECORD a brief summary of the FSC extension.

FEDERAL SUPPLEMENTAL COMPENSATION (FSC) EXTENSION

DURATION OF EXTENSION

18 months, from October 1, 1983 to March 31, 1985.

CURRENT FOUR-TIERED PROGRAM TO BE REPLACED WITH THE FOLLOWING PROGRAM

12 weeks of benefits in States with an IUR greater than or equal to 5 percent.

12 weeks of benefits in States with an IUR greater than or equal to 5 percent.

10 weeks of benefits in States with an IUR greater than or equal to 4 percent, but less than 5 percent.

8 weeks of benefits in States with an IUR greater than or equal to 3 percent but less than 4 percent.

6 weeks in all other States.

OTHER MODIFICATIONS INCLUDE

No additional benefits (reachback) for those who have exhausted or are currently drawing FSC benefits.

No phaseout of benefits at the end of the 18-month period; all FSC benefits would cease on March 31, 1985.

No restrictions on the extent to which benefit durations could be reduced or increased in a State as a result of changes in the IUR. However, a State's duration could not change more often than once every 3 months.

The maximum weeks of benefits (12 weeks) would be payable regardless of current IUR if the State is likely to have an unusually high number of exhaustees because of prolonged high unemployment. States would qualify for this provision for any calendar quarter if the average IUR equals or exceeds 6 percent for the period from January 1982 through the end of the most recent quarter for which IUR data are available.

Any State meeting the criteria in current law for eligibility for 14 weeks of benefits as of the end of the current program, will remain at that level so long as the State continues to meet that criteria.

REASONS FOR EXTENDING FSC

Given the cost of the FSC program to date, and the potential cost of the extension, it makes sense to examine whether or not a need continues to exist for an emergency program of unemployment benefits.

When the Federal supplemental compensation (FSC) program was enacted a year ago to address high levels of unemployment, the national unemployment rate was 9.9 percent and rising. The unemployment rate peaked in December 1982 at 10.8 percent.

Since December, there has been substantial economic growth, a lowering of inflation and significant reductions in unemployment. Real gross national product rose at an annual rate of 5.9 percent in the first half of 1983, while industrial production rose at an annual rate of 17.5 percent. At the same time, the unemployment rate has fallen from its peak of 10.8 percent to 9.5 percent in August, reflecting an employment growth of 2.5 million jobs. Moreover, these gains were achieved with very little inflation; the Consumer Price Index rose only 2.4 percent in the 12 months ending in July 1983.

We are all optimistic that the economic recovery will continue on its present course and that we will continue to achieve significant economic growth, low inflation, and declining unemployment. At the same time, there is no doubt that the current high level of unemployment represents one of our most serious problems. Despite the impressive economic gains in the last 9 months, more than 10 million Americans continue to be unemployed for more than 6 months.

It is also clear that continued economic expansion is not likely to reduce unemployment as quickly as we would like. The experience of past recessions indicates that high levels of unemployment are likely to persist for much of the early stages of the recovery. Moreover, since it is our intention to come out of the recession with a steady recovery that can be sustained over the long run, it is unlikely that unemployment will plummet in the near future.

I believe we all agree that the burden of unemployment must not fall entirely on those unable to find work. At the same time, we must balance our concern for assisting unemployed workers against the need to maintain policies that will foster and sustain the economic recovery. A permanent reduction in unemployment can only be achieved by long-term vigorous economic growth.

The appropriate way to address the problem of high unemployment over the coming months is through an extension of the FSC program for a substantial period of time. Therefore, an 18-month extension of the FSC program is a proper and rational step for Congress and the administration to take. An 18-month extension of FSC from October 1, 1983 to March 31, 1985 would recognize the likelihood, based on past recessions, that unemployment is likely to remain high during this period of the economic recovery.

In such circumstances, it is inappropriate to continue to extend the FSC program every 6 months. The consideration of FSC on a 6 month basis adds unnecessary uncertainty to the lives of the unemployed, creates problems for determining benefit durations, and in general makes the program difficult to administer. An 18-month extension would assure needed financial assistance to the long-term unemployed during this period, while permitting Congress to address the full costs of the program.

I applaud the administration for proposing this historic extension and I commend my colleagues on the Finance Committee for approving it. Currently unemployed individuals or those who may face layoffs would be assured that these emergency unemployment benefits will be available beyond some arbitrary date. An 18-month extension also enables the Congress to evaluate the program now and provide an extension of sufficient length to provide some degree of certainty for the beneficiaries and the administrators of the program.

As chairman of Finance Committee which has jurisdiction over the entire Federal unemployment insurance system, I appreciate the fact that the FSC program represents a significant financial commitment on the part of all American taxpayers to assist unemployed workers during a difficult period. As I mentioned earlier, the FSC program will have paid benefits to over 5 million people at a cost of some $5.6 billion by the end of September. The extension proposed by the administration would add another $3 billion to that commitment. This is not an expenditure which can be taken lightly and it deserves serious consideration by the House and the Senate.

EXTENDED BENEFITS PROGRAM CHANGES

Beyond this FSC extension, it is difficult to see that further action, as some have proposed on the permanent extended benefits (EB) program, can be justified. Some, in the Senate and in the House, would roll back the EB program reforms which passed as part of the 1981 Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act. Such reversals of sound policy reforms would not only add to the Federal and State government costs for unemployment programs, but would also increase the payroll tax burden which already threatens the prosperity of many small- and medium-sized businesses. This is surely not an action to be taken at this delicate point in the economic recovery.

CONCLUSION

I hope my colleagues in the Senate will keep in mind the progress already made toward improving the employment picture when considering the FSC extension. I would remind them that when the FSC program was put into effect just 1 year ago, the total unemployment rate nationally was 9.8 percent and rising. By December of 1982, that rate had peaked at 10.8 percent. At one point in the recession, 11.4 million Americans were out of work. Steady economic growth has occurred since December and economists are basically optimistic that continued improvement is in our future. Unemployment has experienced a steady decline. This summer the unemployment rate had its largest 1-month decline since 1959 with the rate dropping from 10 to 9.5 percent. This represents employment growth of more than 2.5 million jobs and the increase in production in many sectors should lead to significant improvement in the months ahead.

Yet there can be no denying that unemployment is the most serious problem facing the country on the domestic front. Long-term unemployment has grown and the problem of dislocated workers has been well documented. The administration, through its support of the Job Training Partnership Act and its efforts to develop programs for retraining, has initiated the appropriate response to what must be considered structural unemployment. For those unlikely to return to previous jobs, this retraining can make a real difference.

The Federal supplemental compensation program is designed to provide limited financial support on a short-term basis, the proposal we are considering today improves the current program by targeting benefits more effectively and simplifying program administration.

The FSC program clearly represents a significant financial commitment of the part of the American taxpayer. I believe that the Finance Committee bill reaches the acceptable expenditure limits. It is my view that to depart significantly, either in policy or in cost, from the Finance Committee bill, risks a Presidential veto. S. 1887 can be defended as good policy and as fiscally sound. I urge you to support this bill.

Mr. President, at this point in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that the CBO cost estimate be printed.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 27, 1983.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Chairman, Committee on Finance, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to section 403 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the Congressional Budget Office has prepared the attached cost estimate for S. 1887, a bill to extend the Federal Supplemental Compensation Program for eighteen months and for other purposes, as reported by the Senate Committee on Finance, September 26, 1983.

Should the Committee so desire, we would be pleased to provide further details on this estimate.

Sincerely,

JAMES BLUM
(For Rudolph G. Penner, Director).

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE COST ESTIMATE

1. Bill Number: S. 1887.

2. Bill Title: A bill to extend the Federal Supplemental Compensation Program for eighteen months and for other purposes.

3. Bill Status: As reported by the Senate Committee on Finance, September 26, 1983.

4. Bill Purpose: The bill would extend the Federal Supplemental Compensation (FSC) program through March 31, 1985, and would revise the number of weeks of benefits payable. It would extend the authority to fund voluntary placements in the foster care program for one year. BASIS OF ESTIMATE

The following discussion addresses only those sections of the bill that would be expected to have a significant budgetary impact.

FSC Extension (Under CBO economic assumptions of August, 1983, as shown above).

The estimate of the cost of extending the FSC for 18 months is based upon estimates of states' insured unemployment rates, weeks compensated, and average benefit payments. The estimates of states' insured unemployment rates are derived from CBO's assumptions regarding the civilian unemployment rate projected for 1984, 1985 and 1986. These assumptions were published by CBO in August, 1983. CBO estimates that any FSC extension would result in a reduction of AFDC and food stamp outlays as individuals who exhaust unemployment benefits and would otherwise draw benefits from these means-tested programs continue to collect jobless payments. It is estimated that the extension would cause AFDC and food stamp expenditures to drop by $115 million in fiscal year 1984 and by $50 million in fiscal year 1985. According to information from the Joint Tax Committee, the increase in FSC benefits would result in an estimated rise of income tax revenues of $25 million, $115 million, and $30 million in fiscal years 1984, 1985, and 1986.

FSC Extension (Under the Economic Assumptions of the First Concurrent Resolution on the budget for 1984.)

The CBO economic assumptions of August 1983 project the civilian unemployment rate to be 8.9 percent in the first quarter of fiscal year 1984 compared to 9.9 percent rate assumed in the First Budget Resolution. The actual civilian unemployment rate has been declining since the Budget Resolution was agreed to and was 9.5 percent in August of 1982. CBO estimates that an 18 month FSC extension would cost $2,585 million in fiscal year 1984 and $1,120 million in fiscal year 1985, based upon the unemployment rate assumptions underlying the Budget Resolution. This estimated cost would be partially offset by an estimated $170 million decline in AFDC and food stamps in fiscal year 1984 and $75 million in fiscal year 1985. Revenues are estimated to rise by $40 million in fiscal year 1984, $160 million in fiscal year 1985, and $40 million in fiscal year 1986.

TITLE XX

The required budget authority level of $200 million reflects the increase in the ceiling as stated in the bill. Outlays reflect current spending patterns in the Title XX program.

6. Estimated Cost to State and Local Governments: In fiscal year 1981, States received approximately $3.0 billion in federal Title XX funds to operate a wide variety of categorical social services programs. In 1982, a new Title XX block grant was instituted and federal funds were reduced by $600 million to $2.4 billion. In 1983, Title XX was funded at $2.625 billion. Although the block grant has given States more flexibility over the services provided, they have had to either increase state and local social service funding to maintain 1981 program levels or cut back on services in order to compensate for the reductions in federal funds. Data is not yet available on the extent to which States substituted funds versus cutback services. However, some preliminary surveys have indicated it was more the latter. The increase in the 1984 Title XX ceiling to $2.7 billion would allow States some flexibility to either reduce their current funding or increase total program spending.

7. Estimate Comparison: The Department of Labor (DOL) has estimated that the FSC extension would cost $2,580 million in fiscal year 1984 and $1,170 million in fiscal year 1985, without taking offsets into account. The difference between DOL and CBO estimates is due to differences in assumed total and insured unemployment rates.

8. Previous CBO Estimate: On September 21, 1983, CBO provided the House Ways and Means Committee with a cost estimate for H.R. 3929, a bill to extend the FSC program for seven weeks. The $915 million estimated cost of that bill differs from the present estimate due to the fact that the House bill would provide benefits to individuals who have exhausted jobless benefits as well as new beneficiaries and would extend the program for only seven weeks, whereas this bill covers only new beneficiaries and would extend the FSC program for 18 months.

10. Estimate Approved By:

C. G. NUCKOLS
(For James L. Blum,
Assistant Director for Budget Analysis).

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Nation has now suffered through a prolonged recession. We have been experiencing a recovery, but the rate of unemployment throughout much of the country remains unacceptably high. The best long-range solution to this unemployment is a sustained economic recovery which will provide jobs for those who are now out of work. Until those jobs are available, however, we must continue to see that an adequate duration of unemployment benefits remains available. To meet this need, the Committee on Finance has reported legislation to extend the Federal supplemental compensation program.

The supplemental compensation program makes available additional weeks of unemployment benefits for those who are still unable to find work after using up all of the benefits provided by the permanent unemployment programs. This supplemental program is now scheduled to expire at the end of this month. The Finance Committee bill would extend the program for an additional 1½ years, through March 1985. The benefit structure is similar to the existing structure, with benefit duration varying among the States according to the levels of insured unemployment in each State. In recognition of the improving economy, the highest duration of benefits—14 weeks for States with insured unemployment rates above 6 percent—would be eliminated and States would receive only 6 weeks if their insured unemployment has declined below 3 percent. However, any States currently at or above 6 percent insured unemployment would continue to qualify for 14 weeks until their rates fall below that level.

During the committee's hearings on this legislation, particular attention was focused on the measure of unemployment used in this program. The Senator from West Virginia (Mr. BYRD) and the Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) both presented very helpful testimony before the committee pointing out a particular problem which can arise in States which have experienced an especially long period of extremely high unemployment.

Ordinarily, the best measure of unemployment among those who are served by the unemployment benefits program is the insured unemployment rate. This is based on the number of people drawing regular State unemployment benefits as a percent of the number of persons working in covered jobs. This measure, however, becomes less reliable when a State faces massive levels of unemployment over a protracted period of time, as has happened in States like Michigan and West Virginia. In such circumstances, the insured unemployment rate grows to a relatively high level as the early impact of the recession is felt. However, it may later drop, not because of a recovery, but because significant numbers of workers remain out of work well beyond the point where they are drawing regular State unemployment benefits. And since they are not drawing benefits, they are not included in computing the insured unemployment rate.

While there does not exist any statistically valid measure of those who have exhausted their benefit eligibility, the committee found a way to count these long-term unemployed workers on an implicit basis. This is done by averaging the insured unemployment rate over a longer period than the usual 13-week rolling average. Under the committee provision, an insured unemployment rate will be computed over a period starting with January 1982—when several States had reached extremely high insured unemployment levels—and continuing through the most recent calendar quarter for which there are data available. As long as a State's insured unemployment over this longer period averages 6 percent or higher, that State will continue to qualify for the maximum weeks of benefits provided under the usual schedule—that is, 12 additional weeks.

I believe this alternative provision meets the problem of those States that have suffered the severest impact of the recession and for whom the current insured unemployment rate may not be an accurate measure of distress relative to other States. It does so, moreover, in a way which continues to base benefit eligibility on a measure which is statistically valid and which is related directly to the population served by the program.

I believe the Finance Committeee bill represents a thoughtful and appropriate response to the continuing problem of high unemployment which is faced by this country, and I hope that the Senate will approve it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana outlined, I think very well, the bill reported by our Committee on Finance. We have tried to come up with a measure of the IUR which takes account of the long-term unemployment which has occurred in a number of States. We think the committee bill does this.

I know whenever you bring an unemployment compensation bill to this floor, everybody grabs it to see how many weeks every State is going to get and they all try to figure out some way to go get more weeks of benefits.

If we want to keep this bill within range as far as cost is concerned, I urge my colleagues not to try to load up this bill with a lot of amendments. We spent a lot of time on this bill in our committee. The House has passed a 45-day extension. Ours is an 18-month extension.

I have a letter from Secretary Donovan, Secretary of Labor, and Dave Stockman, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, which I will read to my colleagues. I do not quarrel with the fact that everybody has the right, of course, to offer amendments, but I suggest that we have a problem. The problem is we do not have any money. The problem we are facing, according to Mr. Feldstein, between now and October 1987, is about $1,000 billion in new debt. The present debt is about $1.3 trillion. I am told that the interest on the new debt, the debt we are going to create between now and October of 1987, is going to be $90 billion a year. We are already paying interest on the debt of some $130 billion a year.

I am also advised that the tax receipts from individuals in fiscal year 1988 will be about $457 billion. So you can compare the $457 billion in revenues from individuals who pay taxes and the $90 billion in new interest on the new debt. You could be talking about a tax increase for individuals somewhere in the range of 20 percent.

I am not suggesting that has to happen. What really needs to happen is for the Congress to start looking at spending. Stop trying to justify every $100 million or $300 million or $400 million expenditure on some parochial concern that might affect our States. Because if we do not get a handle on Federal spending and a handle on the projected deficits, there is very little chance we are going to have a strong, robust, and long-term recovery.

I say that because this FSC bill is always easy to load up. Senators say they have one amendment that only costs $200 million or $300 million, and it may be justified. But today we intend to examine carefully the amendments that Members may have. The majority leader's concern is that we finish this bill, which I doubt that we can do, by 6:30 tonight. I suggest we are going to try. We do have to go to conference and I do not anticipate an easy conference.

At this point, I would like to include in the RECORD the letter signed by David Stockman, the OMB Director, and by Secretary Donovan, the Secretary of Labor, and particularly quote two paragraphs.

> We endorse your efforts to enact a program that will assure benefits through March 1985, that uses the proved-in-practice insured unemployed rate triggers, and that does not contain a "reach-back" provision. While there are may be some technical adjustments to improve equity in the distribution of benefits, the Administration would opposed any major structural change in the bill.
> The committee's bill calls for FSC spending which is at the absolute outer limit of acceptable bounds. Any change to the bill which increases its cost would seriously jeopardize Administration support of the measure.

I suggest that letter should not be taken lightly. Obviously, there may be some areas that we are going to have to address but I think the letter pretty well lays out the parameters.

I think we should also be aware of the consequences of failing to act on a bill which can be signed by the President before the Federal supplemental compensation program expires at midnight tomorrow night. I stress that Congress must approve a bill which will be acceptable to the administration as I am convinced the President will not sign a bill similar to the one approved by the Ways and Means Committee which is substantially more expensive than the Finance Committee bill, S. 1887. Unless extended, the current FSC program, which provides extra weeks of unemployment benefits for the long-term unemployed, will expire on Friday. While such an expiration would cause hardship to some beneficiaries and considerable administrative confusion, most current FSC recipients will continue to receive benefits after the expiration date as a result of the phaseout provision that was enacted as a part of the extension of the FSC program contained in the social security bill last month. Under this phaseout provision, all persons who have not exhausted their FSC entitlement on September 30 will be eligible to receive up to 50 percent of their remaining entitlement. For example, if a claimant had 8 weeks of FSC entitlement remaining under the FSC program terminated on September 30, he could receive up to 4 weeks of FSC benefits after the 30th. However, persons who first exhaust their regular unemployment benefits after September 30 would receive no FSC benefits under the phaseout. The only way for such unemployed workers to receive FSC payments is for the program to be extended.

The Department of Labor estimates that this phaseout will insure that about 600,000 of the current 700,000 FSC recipients will continue to receive phaseout benefits at the end of the first week following the expiration of the FSC program. About 39,000 new potential recipients will be denied benefits during the first week after the expiration of the program.

I point that out to indicate we do have a sense of urgency in this matter. We have not yet received the House-passed bill, the 45-day extension which was passed earlier today. That bill will be at the desk and we will properly amend it later.

According to the Labor Department this week, the States have begun to notify FSC recipients of the possible termination of the FSC program and its benefits. Hopefully, the States have also advised FSC recipients of the phaseout feature of the current program.

Also, during the week of September 25, the States began to review and test procedures under the phaseout. For the week of October 3, the States will suspend regular FSC payments and continue payments under the phaseout. States will issue monetary determinations of all affected individuals under the phaseout payment procedures. Finally, during the week of October 10 the States will begin making payments under the phaseout procedures. Remember that as of October 1 no new FSC recipients will have been accepted.

The Department of Labor has provided the following possible timetable for continuing FSC payments should legislation be passed and signed by the President. I urge my colleagues to take careful note of the assumptions made.

First, we assume Congress amends the FSC Act by September 30.

Second, we assume the extension includes no reach-back to add weeks of benefits for claimants who have exhausted FSC including reach-back benefits which create additional administrative problems and confusion and could delay swift implementation of the extension.

Third, we assume that some States will have changes in maximum duration. I would point out that this is less of a problem with the Finance Committee bill than with the Ways and Means Committee bill which not only changes just about every State's duration but also uses a TUR trigger never used before and which is not readily available for all States.

Fourth, we assume that the enrollment and signature of the new law occurs within 7 days.

Fifth, we assume that action on the continuing resolution, or the Department of Labor appropriation bill is taken for fiscal year 1984.

Should all these steps take place in an expeditious fashion, the Labor Department provides the following timetable for administrative implementation:

5-7 working days or by (Oct. 7), Labor Department prepares and signs FSC agreements under new law for signature of Governors.

Labor Department prepares implementing instructions for States.

5-10 days or by (Oct. 12-17) Governors receive, sign, and return FSC agreements reflecting new law.

9-21 days or by (Oct. 10-Nov. 4) States implement FSC amendments.

Develop and issue State FSC procedure; reprogram FSC changes into State; automated systems.

Train payments staffs of non-automated States; provide advance notice to claimants of any change in entitlement or monetary determination.

9-24 days or by (Oct. 10-Nov. 7) States begin paying benefits under new FSC law.

From this timetable, it is evident that the more amendments to S. 1887 which are offered and adopted, the more difficult it will be for FSC benefits to continue without interruption.

As I mentioned earlier, the national association which represents State UI administrators believes the Finance Committee bill can be implemented without serious delay.

The Ways and Means Committee bill would cause tremendous disruptions and would likely not be fully implemented during the 45-days of the bill's program.

This is all technical in nature but the important point is that we must move quickly on this legislation.

Mr. President, the first thing we would like to proceed with would be an amendment by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, a member of the committee, who would also like to make a statement, is that correct?

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, first, before we get to the question of the IUR and the TUR, which we will in a second, I compliment the Senator from Kansas, the chairman of our committee, on moving very rapidly on a program that is very, very important to my constituents.

This program, the Federal supplemental benefit program, expires tomorrow night. People are depending on these benefits to pay mortgages, car bills, doctor bills, and grocery bills, and they are worried that Congress will not reauthorize this program.

Our mailbag is full. Our telephones have rung off the hooks.

It seems to this Senator we should act expeditiously in providing an 18-month extension of the FSB program before us.

We do not want to be back here this winter, this spring, this coming summer or this fall. We all want to be back in November, I suppose.

It is my hope that this extension will prevail and that we do not find ourselves sometime next year working on another 11th-hour extension.

Mr. President, the Senate and House of Representatives are going to go to conference on the differences between the House and the Senate bill.

I also urge my colleagues to expedite that consideration as well.

I would not want my colleagues to think that the Senator from Pennsylvania is unmindful, however, of some of the problems that we have in our existing program.

I, for one, am convinced that our existing unemployment compensation program is deeply flawed and in need of major revisions. It was to that end that the minority leader, Senator BYRD of West Virginia, and I introduced a comprehensive bill. We believe that the system requires careful review and complete overhaul, but I would also add that I do not believe that this piece of legislation which is so vital to so many is the bill on which to do that.

We should not jeopardize it by trying to enact comprehensive reforms on it here today.

So I urge my colleagues to keep that in mind.

AMENDMENT NO. 2243

(Purpose: To revise the FSC provisions and use the total unemployment rate instead of the rate of insured unemployment)

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, principally for the purposes of discussion, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) proposes an amendment numbered 2243.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out sections 3 and 4 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

NUMBER OF WEEKS OF BENEFITS

SEC. 3. (a) Section 602(e) of the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act of 1982 is amended by striking out paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(i) 50 percent of the total amount of regular compensation (including dependents' allowances) payable to the individual with respect to the benefit year (as determined under the State law) on the basis of which he most recently received regular compensation, or

"(ii) the applicable limit determined under the following table times his average weekly benefit amount for his benefit year:

"In the case of weeks during a:	The applicable limit is:

"(C) In the case of the account of an individual to whom Federal supplemental compensation was payable for a week beginning before October 1, 1983, and who exhausted his rights to such compensation (by reason of the payment of all of the amount in such account) after March 31, 1983 and prior to October 1, 1983, the amount established in such account for compensation payable for weeks beginning on or after October 1, 1983, shall be equal to such individual's additional entitlement.

"(D) For purposes of subparagraph (C) and this subparagraph the term 'additional entitlement' means the lesser of—

"(i) 16 percent of the total amount of regular compensation (including dependents' allowances) payable to the individual with respect to the benefit year (as determined under the State law) on the basis of which he most recently received regular compensation; or

"(ii) 4 times the individual's average weekly benefit amount for his benefit year.

"(3)(A) For purposes of this subsection, the terms '10-percent period', '8-percent period', '6-percent period', and 'low-unemployment period' mean, with respect to any State, the period which—

"(ii) ends with the 3d week after the 1st week in which the total unemployment rate for the period consisting of such week and the immediately preceding 12 weeks does not fall within the applicable range.

"(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A), the applicable range is as follows:

"In the case of a:	The applicable range is:
10-percent period.	A rate equal to or exceeding 10 percent.

Low-unemployment period.	A rate less than 6 percent.

"(C) Each 10-percent period, 8-percent period, 6-percent period, or low-unemployment period, as the case may be, which is in effect for the week beginning on October 2, 1983, shall last for a period consisting of all weeks beginning in October and November 1983. Succeeding periods shall begin with the first week beginning in December, and every second month thereafter, and remain in effect for all weeks beginning in that month and the following month (but subject to the termination provision under subsection (f)(2)).

"(D) For purposes of this subsection the amount of an individual's average weekly benefit amount shall be determined in the same manner as determined for purposes of section 202(b)(1)(C) of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970.

"(4) For purposes of this section, the term 'total unemployment rate' means—

"(A) the seasonally adjusted total unemployment rate with respect to any State for which the Bureau of Labor Statistics compiles such rate on a month-to-month basis; or

"(B) the total unemployment rate (unadjusted) with respect to any other State.".

(b) Section 602(d) of such Act is amended by striking out "or (D)(ii)".

EFFECTIVE DATE OF FSC PROVISIONS

SEC. 4. (a) The amendments made by sections 2 and 3 shall apply to weeks beginning after September 30, 1983.

(b) In the case of any eligible individual—

(1) to whom any Federal supplemental compensation was payable for any week beginning before October 1, 1983, and

(2) who exhausted his rights to such compensation (by reason of the payment of all the amount in his Federal supplemental compensation account) before the first week beginning after September 30, 1983, such individual's eligibility for additional weeks of compensation by reason of the amendments made by this Act shall not be limited or terminated by reason of any event, or failure to meet any requirement of law relating to eligibility for unemployment compensation, occurring after the date of such exhaustion of rights and before October 1, 1983 (and the period after such exhaustion and before October 1, 1983, shall not be counted for purposes of determining the expiration of the two years following the end of his benefit year for purposes of section 602(b) of the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act of 1982).

(c) The Secretary of Labor shall, at the earliest practicable date after the date of the enactment of this Act, propose to each State with which he has in effect an agreement under section 602 of the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act of 1982 a modification of such agreement designed to provide for the payment of Federal supplemental compensation under such Act in accordance with the amendments made by sections 2 and 3. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, if any State fails or refuses, within the 3-week period beginning on the date the Secretary of Labor proposed such a modification to such State, to enter into such a modification of such agreement, the Secretary of Labor shall terminate such agreement effective with the end of the last week which ends on or before the first day of such 3-week period.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I would just say to my colleagues one of the issues we discussed at length in the Finance Committee was the adequacy of the insured unemployment rate, the so-called IUR, for accurately giving us a measure of the difficulty in finding a job. It is, of course, the measure for triggering-on the Federal supplemental benefits, the program before us. It is also the measure of triggering-on and off for the extended benefits.

The amendment before us would substitute the total unemployment rate on an appropriate table to trigger Federal supplemental benefits instead of the insured unemployment rate.

Mr. President, I will say to my colleagues I do not intend to press this issue to a vote, but I think it is important that we understand what some of the problems are with the IUR and get a consensus of how in the weeks and months ahead we can work toward a better solution than the IUR.

But I wish to engage with my friend from Kansas in a colloquy on this subject and let me ask the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee.

It is this Senator's view that currently the gap between the TUR and IUR is extremely wide by historical standards. The bill before us, our Finance Committee bill, does not employ the total unemployment rate.

Indeed, the chairman of the Finance Committee has opposed the use of the TUR and further the committee, after considerable debate, decided to omit the use of the TUR instead of the IUR. Most of our colleagues were not privileged to participate in that debate, and I have earlier enumerated the problems we have with the IUR to state the case for an alternative to it.

This amendment, of course, would propose such an alternative so that we can have a concrete example before us.

Let me, therefore, ask the Senator from Kansas to state his views on the TUR as a substitute for the IUR.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator has correctly indicated that the Finance Committee proposal does not employ the TUR. Let me also say that, as indicated earlier in the Chamber, a major overhaul is needed in this whole area, and this is being spearheaded right now by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) along with the distinguished minority leader, Senator BYRD. Their approach is a very comprehensive unemployment compensation revision which does employ the TUR.

We have had hearings that touched on their proposal and heard about some of its potential. We promised to approach the TUR in a more realistic way in this new legislation or some version of new legislation.

First of all, the TUR measures unemployment among all workers or individuals seeking work while the IUR measures unemployment among those workers eligible for unemployment benefits. Second, the bases for computing the rates are different. The TUR is computed using the unemployed individual's place of residence while the IUR is based on a place of work concept.

In addition, the State TUR is derived from a sample for the 10 largest States, and a complex process involving various estimates and assumptions for the remaining States. The numbers are benchmarked at various times of the year often with significant shifts occurring. The TUR is thus subject to a great degree of error and variation.

The TUR is not available for over 2 months after the measurement period.

Those are some of the reasons we believe that we must be cautious about changing the unemployment measure.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Kansas. If he would allow me to propound one other question and allow me to address the converse issue, why does the Senator from Kansas think that the insured unemployment rate, the IUR, is a better method.

Mr. DOLE. There is some doubt about which may be the better. Maybe it is the IUR or the TUR, or maybe it is some other measure.

It is important to note, however, that the IUR is an actual count of individuals who file for unemployment compensation benefits. These individuals are defined in each State law as those who have significant attachment to the labor force and who are actively seeking work. The TUR, as I mentioned before, is based on a sample and a complex process of estimation and adjustments. The IUR counts individuals who may benefit from the FSC program before they exhaust their regular UC benefits. These individuals are counted each week from the time they enter the program until they become eligible for EB or FSC.

Mr. HEINZ. I appreciate the thoughtful comments and learned comments of the chairman.

May I say that because many of us voiced concerns about the shortcomings of the conventional use of the IUR in measuring the difficulty in finding a job compared to the TUR, the Finance Committee has used the IUR in this bill quite different from either current law or the House bill.

Could the Senator from Kansas explain how the committee proposal uses the IUR to measure the long-term unemployment problems in a State?

Mr. DOLE. Let me say that we were trying to find some way to deal with the concerns raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania—the Senator from West Virginia is now in the Chamber, Senator BYRD—and other Senators from States with high unemployment of long duration.

So in addition to the normal extended benefit IUR, the committee proposal has included a second IUR defined over a longer period of time. Initially this second IUR will be computed using data from January 1982 through June of 1983. By using this longer measure, individuals who have drawn UC but are not included in the most recent IUR are included in determining a State's FSC duration. Thus, a State which has had continued high unemployment may be eligible for additional weeks of FSC.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I commend the chairman of the committee, Senator DOLE, for that explanation.

His last point is particularly important. We have, all of us, who have studied this somewhat obtuse technical issue, realized that after an individual is on the basic benefit program, the State program for what in most States is a 26-week period, that person stops being counted, drops from the rolls. What the chairman of the Finance Committee has done is to reach back to the greatest depths of the recession and start the count of those individuals back to January 1982.

I think that while that may not be the ultimate or the perfect solution to the problem, it is a very good solution to the problem. It is a solution which I know is going to work at least for the duration of this bill, 18 months, and therefore because it is extremely important to the unemployed workers who depend upon the program I think it is a good solution.

I also am convinced that we must go ahead and move ahead with our comprehensive review of the unemployment compensation system.

Senator BYRD, the author of the bill I am privileged to cosponsor, and I do believe that last year has demonstrated that our existing permanent program is insufficient to meet our commitments during times of high unemployment, but at the same time we should examine how best to link unemployment compensation and retraining efforts to facilitate the rehiring of displaced workers.

I hope that the Finance Committee and the other responsible committees of Congress will be able to undertake that view and that overhaul in the future.

Mr. President, I thank my friend from Kansas, the chairman of the committee, for his responses, which have been full, detailed, and quite responsive.

I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COCHRAN assumed the chair.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

As I indicated earlier, we have tried to move very quickly because September 30 is not far away. Until we have more opportunity for full-fledged hearings on the Byrd-Heinz proposal, we felt it best to try to find some other way to modify the IUR to reach back further, to take care of some of these areas and provide extra weeks of benefits.

I thank the staff for coming up with a balanced proposal and one that touches on the concerns expressed by Senator BYRD, Senator HEINZ, and others.

I appreciate the Senator withdrawing the amendment. I also appreciate the record we have made, which indicates that there are going to be full, extensive hearings on the proposals of the two principal sponsors, Senator HEINZ and the distinguished minority leader, Senator BYRD, who are now on the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, first, I thank the chairman of the committee, the ranking minority member, and other members of the committee for the consideration and the courtesies that have been extended to those of us who have joined in sponsoring the bill which Senator HEINZ and I have sponsored. We had good hearings, and we had an opportunity to make our case.

I think the chairman and the committee are striving to come to grips with this problem. What they have done here will certainly be helpful to my State of West Virginia.

So what I have to say beyond that is certainly not in any criticism of the committee. I think it is striving to find a fairer way and a better formula than the one that is presently being used, and by virtue of which only two States—I believe my State and the State of the distinguished ranking minority member, Mr. LONG—and possibly Puerto Rico qualify for extended benefits. That may not be for long, however.

I commend Senator HEINZ for bringing before the Senate today the pressing need for some unemployment benefit determinant other than by the insured unemployment rate, or IUR.

I have explored the IUR quite carefully as I have prepared the form of legislation I introduced with Senator HEINZ and other Senators on August 4—S. 1784. It was not hard to conclude that it failed miserably as the sole eligibility determinant in the extended benefits program and as the determinant of how many weeks States may qualify for the Federal supplemental compensation program.

As Chairman DOLE, Mr. LONG, the ranking minority manager, and Mr. HEINZ know, ultimately we incorporated the total unemployment rate, TUR, as a suggested alternative determinant in S. 1784.

I have noted the arguments that have been made against the use of the TUR for this purpose. I and others who today seek use of the TUR are among the first to acknowledge that there are some valid criticisms. When I introduced the bill, I stated that the TUR had weaknesses, and I urged that the determinant be strengthened and that a careful search be made for a better determinant than either the IUR or the TUR.

The chairman of the committee, Mr. DOLE, has just indicated a recognition of this problem and a determination to proceed expeditiously in the effort to resolve the problem in such a way as would be more fair to the States throughout the country, and I hope the committee, with its expertise, will be able to improve over the suggestions in the bill.

I wish to remind the Senate that at the current time, almost half the States have total unemployment rates above 9 percent. Only two States, as I have said earlier, are eligible for the EB program because the IUR's that other States have are not high enough. Several States with among the highest total unemployment rates—far above the national average—are eligible for the minimum weeks of FSC benefits because they do not have sufficiently high IUR's.

It is ironic that the IUR is used to determine need for additional weeks of benefits for the long-term unemployed when it deliberately does not count the long-term unemployed. It counts only those who receive the first tier of benefits—State basic benefits. It omits recipients of EB and FSC as well as those who have exhausted all benefits.

The worse unemployment becomes in a State, and the longer the average jobless person remains unemployed, the more the IUR understates unemployment. In fact, the IUR is a perverse measure of the need for benefits beyond those in basic State programs. Yet, it is now the only determinant that is used by which States may qualify for extended benefits and the only determinant, I believe, by which States may determine the number of weeks of supplemental benefits to which they may be entitled.

Scholarly studies have concluded the IUR is flawed. A recent study by Gary Burtless stated:

> The IUR has apparently lost much of its value as an indicator of employment prospects for job losers. . . . The IUR should be temporarily retired as a serious measure of labor market conditions.

In addition to the more obvious shortcomings and effects, the IUR of each State is dramatically responsive to the choices the State makes with respect to the size, benefit amounts, and eligibility in its own State basic unemployment insurance program. As a result, the long-term unemployed in a State are penalized when that State experiences high unemployment if the State has tightened eligibility for its basic program, because the IUR will fall from its level if the change has not been made. This is hardly fair. And it hardly is the proper incentive for prudent, tightly managed unemployment insurance programs.

So I am pleased to see that the Finance Committee, in formulating the bill now before us, acknowledged the inadequacy of the current law benefit determinants employing the IUR, and attempted to compensate for that inadequacy by employing an 18-month IUR average as an alternative determinant. Unquestionably, the immediate, practical effect of this change would be an improvement over current law, and the committee is to be commended for moving to address the IUR's problems. But I am very concerned by the fact that this is inescapably only a temporary solution.

Of course, sometimes we have to reach a final solution of problems by, for the time being, utilizing temporary measures. It is one that just compensates for the inadequacy of the IUR rather than correcting the inadequacy. So I believe the TUR is a more appealing determinant. It certainly is not guaranteed to become obsolete, as the committee acknowledges will happen to the 18-month IUR average.

The TUR has its problems, as has been pointed out, but the IUR has even more problems. For every problem with the TUR that is noted, I can cite a problem with the IUR. Neither is very good for its purpose—which is why Senator HEINZ and I and other Senators believe we should try using a combination of the two until we can find or devise a more suitable determinant of the need for benefits for the long-term unemployed. I hope the Senate will agree to that trial.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader. I appreciate his kind remarks. We did seek to address most of the concerns he expressed. We may not have gotten as far as some want us to go, but I think when we finish our hearings on the Byrd-Heinz or Heinz-Byrd comprehensive legislation, we may have a different formula.

Mr. President, I would like to yield to the Senator from Arkansas who has an amendment that we can accept, if that is satisfactory. Senator MOYNIHAN has one we cannot accept.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announces that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is withdrawn.

The Senator from Arkansas.

AMENDMENT NO. 2246

(Purpose: To require that arrangements be entered into to ensure that unemployment compensation is not paid to Federal retirees or Federal prisoners)

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself, Mr. DOLE, and Mr. COCHRAN, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), for himself, Mr. DOLE, and Mr. COCHRAN, proposes an amendment numbered 2246.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out section 6 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

ARRANGEMENTS TO PREVENT PAYMENTS OF UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION TO RETIREES AND PRISONERS

SEC. 6. (a) The Secretary of Labor, the Director of the Office of Personnel Management, and the Attorney General are directed to enter into arrangements to make available to the States, computer or other data regarding current and retired Federal employees and Federal prisoners so that States may review the eligibility of these individuals for unemployment compensation, and take action where appropriate.

(b) The Secretary of Labor shall report to the Congress, prior to January 31, 1984, on arrangements which have been entered into under subsection (a), and any arrangements which could be entered into with other appropriate State agencies, for the purpose of ensuring that unemployment compensation is not paid to retired individuals or prisoners in violation of law. The report shall include any recommendations for further legislation which might be necessary to aid in preventing such payments.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I believe this amendment has been accepted and is agreeable to the various parties.

Mr. President, this amendment would simply direct that the Secretary of Labor, the Director of the Office of Personnel Management, and the Attorney General enter into arrangements to make available to the States computer data regarding current and retired Federal employees and Federal prisoners so that States may review the eligibility of these individuals for unemployment compensation, and take action where appropriate.

It would assure implementation of the findings of a recent General Accounting Office study (GGD-83-99) that computer matches result in substantial savings to Federal and State governments.

The GAO study, which only performed computer matches involving the governments of Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia, located potential overpayments in excess of $700,000 in the field of unemployment compensation.

Nationwide use of computer matches could easily result in savings of millions of dollars.

I ask unanimous consent that the excellent General Accounting Office report be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT TO THE HONORABLE DAVID PRYOR, UNITED STATES SENATE

(By the U.S. General Accounting Office)

COMPUTER MATCHES IDENTIFY POTENTIAL UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT OVERPAYMENTS

U.S. GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE,
Washington, D.C., August 24, 1983.

Hon. DAVID H. PRYOR,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR PRYOR: On November 10, 1982, you asked us to determine if retired Federal civilian and military personnel pensions were being deducted from State unemployment benefits as required by Federal and State laws. You were concerned these laws were not being enforced because of our October 29, 1982, report to you [1] in which we found that pensions to five former employees at the Departments of Labor and Energy were not being deducted from their District of Columbia unemployment payments. To determine if this was a problem in other agencies, we performed a computer match of Federal civilian and military retirees with persons receiving unemployment benefits from the District, Maryland, and Virginia.

Also, as discussed with your office, we performed a computer match to determine if District of Columbia prisoners were receiving District, Virginia, or Maryland unemployment benefits to which they were not entitled, since State unemployment laws require that recipients be available for work. Your concern was based on our July 22, 1982, report [2] which found that some prisoners were improperly receiving various Federal benefits, such as veterans' pensions.

In addition, we matched District, Virginia, and Maryland computer files of unemployment recipients to identify (1) persons receiving unemployment benefits simultaneously from more than one State and (2) persons receiving more than one unemployment payment for the same period from the same State. Our findings are summarized below and discussed in detail in the appendix, as are our review objectives, scope and methodology.

Through our matches, we identified 604 persons who may have improperly received unemployment payments: 323 in the District, 169 in Virginia, and 112 in Maryland. Maryland officials advised us that none of the persons we matched and referred to them improperly received unemployment payments. However, District and Virginia officials have tentatively confirmed that 271 of the 492 persons (55 percent we referred to them improperly received $734,916 in unemployment payments. These potential improper payments consisted of $703,870 to 238 Federal retirees; $26,982 to 30 District prisoners; $2,206 to two persons simultaneously receiving unemployment benefits from the District and one State; and $1,858 to one person receiving more than one unemployment payment for the same period from Virginia.

The actual amount of improper payments may change as District and Virginia officials continue to interview individual claimants and investigate potential fraud cases. Unemployment officials have agreed to advise us of the final results.

We believe that computer matches like the ones we performed are useful and cost-effective ways to identify overpayments. Both District and Virginia unemployment officials said that, in the future, resources permitting, they would consider performing similar periodic computer matches.

Department of Labor officials advised us that they recently arranged with the Office of Personnel Management to provide States with computer tapes of current and retired Federal employees. Labor plans to notify States that the computer data will be available for them to perform computer matches and encourage them to perform such matches. In addition, the Secretary of Labor has acted on our October 29, 1982, report recommendation to alert Federal agencies of the need to, among other things, notify State unemployment offices when former employees who apply for unemployment benefits are retired and receiving pensions. This should reduce agencies' future unemployment costs.

In response to your request, we did not obtain agency comments on this report. However, we did discuss its contents with District, Maryland, and Virginia unemployment officials and, in preparing the report, we considered their views.

As arranged with your office, unless you publicly announce its contents earlier, we plan no further distribution of this report until 30 days from the date of this letter. At that time, we will send copies to interested parties, including the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, and the Secretary of Labor. We will make copies available to others upon request.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM J. ANDERSON,
Director,
General Government Division.

APPENDIX

OBJECTIVES, SCOPE, AND METHODOLOGY

Our objectives were to determine if improper unemployment benefits were being paid to (1) Federal military and civilian retirees, (2) District of Columbia prisoners, (3) persons simultaneously receiving unemployment benefits from more than one State or (4) persons receiving more then one unemployment payment for the same period from the same State.

District of Columbia unemployment officials provided us with computer tapes containing data for all persons who received unemployment benefits from January through March 1982. Virginia and Maryland unemployment officials provided the same type of computer data for persons receiving unemployment payments during March 1982.

To determine if Federal retirees' pensions were being deducted from their State unemployment payments, the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) and the Department of Defense (DOD) provided us with computer tapes listing all civilian and military retirees receiving pension checks during March 1982,[1] the dollar amount of the pensions and other identifying data such as social security numbers and dates of birth. We then matched these tapes with the District, Virginia and Maryland unemployment tapes and, when we found names appearing on both tapes, asked the appropriate State unemployment offices to answer the following questions:

Were the retirees' pensions being deducted from State unemployment benefits as required by Federal and State laws?

How much in unemployment benefits was improperly paid to Federal retirees whose pensions were not being deducted?

Had the Federal retirees accurately reported to the State unemployment offices that they were retired and had applied for or were receiving their pensions?

Were the identified overpayments charged to the Federal agencies from which the employees retired or to the private employers for whom the retirees worked after leaving Federal service?

To determine if District of Columbia prisoners were improperly receiving unemployment benefits, we asked the District's Department of Corrections to provide us with a cumputer tape of District prisoners for March 1982. We then matched the names on this tape with the names of persons receiving District, Virginia, or Maryland unemployment payments. When the same names appeared on both tapes, we referred them to the appropriate State unemployment office to determine if these people had indeed received unemployment benefits improperly. Since prisoners are unavailable for work, they are not entitled to receive unemployment benefits.

To determine if anyone in our sample was improperly receiving unemployment benefits from more than one State or receiving more than one unemployment payment for the same period from the same State, we matched the names and addresses from the District, Virginia, and Maryland computer tapes. When we found names that matched, we gave them to the appropriate unemployment officials for verification.

State unemployment offices computed potential overpayments for the period of time the persons first received unemployment payments up until about January 1983 when the State unemployment offices calculated the amount of potential overpayments.

We performed our review in accordance with generally accepted government audit standards except that we did not independently verify information on the computer tapes.

BACKGROUND ON UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION FOR FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Since January 1, 1955, Federal civilian employees have had unemployment insurance protection under Chapter 85, Title 5, of the U.S. Code. In addition, Public Law 96-499, the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of December 5, 1980, requires each Federal agency to pay the costs for all unemployment benefits paid to eligible former Federal employees by all 50 States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands (hereafter referred to as States).

The Department of Labor, through its Employment and Training Administration's Unemployment Insurance Service, is responsible for (1) developing administrative procedures and forms for States and Federal agencies to use and (2) advising State offices and Federal agencies of their responsibilities under the law. The Secretary of Labor has entered into agreements to require all States to pay unemployment compensation to former Federal employees in the same amount and under the same terms and conditions that apply to unemployed private industry claimants. Generally, the paying State will be the one in which the claimant's last official duty station was located.

[2] "Prisoners Receiving Social Security and Other Federal Retirement, Disability, and Education Benefits" (GAO/HRD-82-43)

[1] We did not ask for information on pensions paid to retirees' survivors because Federal law does not require States to deduct these payments from unemployment benefits.

All States require that, to receive payments, a claimant must be unemployed from lack of work but be able and available for work. State unemployment compensation laws and policies vary regarding eligibility requirements, amount of payments, and duration of payments.

Public Law 96-364, section 414, dated September 26, 1980, states the specific circumstances under which States must deduct certain types of pensions from unemployment benefits if employers in the State are to be entitled to Federal tax credits for amounts paid into the State unemployment funds. However, this law does not prevent States from deducting other types of pensions. For example, District and Virginia laws generally require that pensions from any prior employment be deducted, a requirement not dictated by Federal law.

A Department of Labor official advised us that from October 1982 through March 1983, nearly 31,000 former Federal civilian and 22,000 former military personnel had collected unemployment payments. The estimated unemployment costs for former civilian and military personnel for fiscal year 1983 are $232 million and $178 million, respectively.

RESULTS OF PENSION MATCH

Our computer match identified 434 Federal civilian and military retirees who may have received unemployment benefits to which they were not entitled. We gave their names to the appropriate unemployment officials to determine whether the unemployment payments had been improper.

Maryland unemployment officials advised us that the 88 Federal civilian and military retirees we referred to them did not receive improper unemployment payments, primarily because Maryland law is not as restrictive as Virginia or District laws regarding the deduction of pensions. However, as shown in Table I, District and Virginia unemployment officials have tentatively confirmed that 238 of the 346 retirees (69 percent) we referred to them had improperly received $703,870 in unemployment payments. Of this amount, District overpayments were $612,723 (87 percent) and Virginia overpayments were $91,147 (13 percent). Fifty percent of the District's potential overpayments resulted from the failure to deduct civilian pensions, while 89 percent of Virginia's potential overpayments resulted from failure to deduct military pensions.

TABLE I.—POTENTIAL OVERPAYMENTS RESULTING FROM PENSIONS NOT BEING DEDUCTED ACCORDING TO STATE LAWS

Types of pension received	Number of names referred by GAO	Number of tentative confirmations	Amount of potential overpayments
District of Columbia:
Civilian	156	102	$307,276
Military	86	77	305,447
Total	242	179	612,723
Virginia:
Civilian	14	4	10,046
Military	90	55	81,101
Total	104	59	91,147
Total:
Civilian	170	106	317,322
Military	176	132	386,548
Total	346	238	703,870

The remaining 108 retirees whose names we referred to the District and Virginia unemployment offices did not receive improper unemployment payments for various reasons (e.g. their pensions were being deducted as required).

District and Virginia unemployment officials cannot make final determinations on the propriety of the potential overpayments for the 238 persons discussed above until they (1) obtain additional information through their normal adjudication processes and (2) investigate potential fraud cases. They agreed to advise us of their final determinations.

Initial findings, however—as shown in table 2—reveal that $213,244 (30 percent) of the total amount of potential overpayments was attributable to claimants not notifying the unemployment offices that they were retired and were receiving or had applied for pensions. An additional $425,274 of potential overpayments (60 percent) was attributable to administrative errors. Claimants had informed the unemployment offices in the District and Virginia that they were receiving or had applied for pensions, but the offices had not deducted the amounts from the unemployment payments. At the completion of our audit work, District officials were not able to explain the remaining potential overpayments of $65,352 (9 percent). A District unemployment official advised us that a recent upgrading of the District's computer facility should help reduce future overpayments to retirees resulting from administrative errors.

TABLE 2.—CAUSE OF POTENTIAL OVERPAYMENTS TO RETIREES

	District	Virginia	Total
Retiree did not report pension	$152,862	$60,382	$213,244
Unemployment office administrative error	394,509	30,765	425,274
No cause indentified	65,352		65,352
Total	612,723	91,147	703,870

As table 3 shows, $284,596 (40 percent) of the overpayments resulting from not deducting retirees' pensions were charged to Federal agencies and $386,216 (55 percent) of the overpayments were charged to private employers that retirees had worked for after leaving Federal service and $33,058 (5 percent) were allocated between Federal and private employers. The Departments of Defense, Labor, Energy, Housing and Urban Development, the Office of Management and Budget, OPM, and the General Services Administration were among the agencies charged.

TABLE 3.—AMOUNT OF POTENTIAL OVERPAYMENT TO RETIREES CHARGED TO FEDERAL AGENCIES AND PRIVATE EMPLOYERS

	Federal agencies	Private employers	Federal and private employers	Total
District of Columbia	$262,090	$317,575	$33,058	$612,723
Virginia	22,506	68,641	0	91,147
Total	284,596	386,216	33,058	703,870

According to a District unemployment official, the District periodically adjusts its unemployment tax rate for private employers, basing such adjustments on the amount of unemployment benefits paid to the employers' former employees. The District official pointed out that, as a result of a large amount of potential overpayments charged to private employers, some private employers in the District may have paid more unemployment taxes to the District than they should have.

RESULTS OF PRISONER MATCH

As table 4 shows, District and Virginia unemployment officials have tentatively confirmed that 30 of the 50 prisoners (60 percent) whose names we identified through the matches may not have been entitled to the $26,982 they received in unemployment payments. Ninety-three percent of the potential overpayments were paid by the District, and all were charged to private employers except for $585. We did not identify any District prisoners receiving Maryland unemployment payments.

TABLE 4.—POTENTIAL OVERPAYMENTS TO DISTRICT PRISONERS

	District of Columbia	Virginia	Total
Number of names referred by GAO	48	2	50
Number of overpayments tentatively confirmed by States	28	2	30
Total dollar amounts of potential overpayments	$25,001	$1,981	$26,982

RESULTS OF MATCH FOR DUPLICATE PAYMENTS

We referred the names of 25 persons who may have received unemployment benefits from more than one State to the appropriate State unemployment officials. District unemployment officials tentatively confirmed that two of these persons improperly received a total of $2,206 in unemployment benefits; that is, they were receiving benefits from the District and from Maryland or Virginia simultaneously.

We also referred the names of 95 persons who may have received more than one unemployment payment for the same periods from the same State to the appropriate unemployment officials. Virginia unemployment officials tentatively confirmed that one of these recipients may have improperly received an overpayment of $1,858 in unemployment benefits.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, finally I wish to thank very much the distinguished Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Finance Committee, and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN)—who, at this time, is presiding in the Chamber—for their support on this amendment.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I want to compliment the distinguished Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), for his excellent work in discovering this blatant waste of tax dollars in the unemployment compensation program.

There is every reason to believe that the adoption of this amendment will result in much needed savings to both the Federal and State Governments.

Over payment of benefits from Federal programs is a troublesome and serious problem. Computer matching is a helpful way to reduce the costs of errors and omissions.

I am pleased to be a part of the effort to bring this to the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR).

The amendment (No. 2246) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEINZ. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2247

(Purpose: To revise the FSC provisions to include new benefits for individuals who have exhausted their entitlement, to allow an alternate measurement based upon the total unemployment rate, and for other purposes)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself, Mr. BYRD, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. DIXON, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. LEAHY, and Mr. SASSER, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN), for himself, Mr. BYRD, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. DIXON, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. LEAHY, and Mr. SASSER, proposes an amendment numbered 2247.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out sections 2, 3, and 4 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 3. (a) Section 602(e) of the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act of 1982 is amended by striking out paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2)(A) Except as otherwise provided in this paragraph, the amount established in such account shall be equal to the lesser of—

"(i) 55 percent of the total amount of regular compensation (including dependents' allowances) payable to the individual with respect to the benefit year (as determined under the State law) on the basis of which he most recently received regular compensation, or

"(ii) the applicable limit determined under the following table times his average weekly benefit amount for his benefit year:

In the case of weeks during a:	The applicable limit is:
5-percent period	14
4-percent period	12
3-percent period	9
Low-unemployment period	7

"(B) The total amount established in any account of an individual who received Federal supplemental compensation for any week beginning prior to October 1, 1983, but has not exhausted his rights to such compensation (by reason of the payment of all of the amount in such account) prior to October 1, 1983, shall not be less than the amount of compensation to which such individual would have been entitled under the provisions of this subtitle as in effect prior to the amendments made by the Federal Supplemental Compensation Amendments of 1983, including the dermination date and reduced compensation amount contained in subsection (f)(2) as then in effect.

"(C) In the case of the account of an individual to whom Federal supplemental compensation was payable for a week beginning before October 1, 1983, and who exhausted his rights to such compensation (by reason of the payment of all of the amount in such account) after March 31, 1983 and prior to October 1, 1983, the amount established in such account for compensation payable for weeks beginning on or after October 1, 1983, shall be equal to such individual's additional entitlement.

For purposes of eligibility for, and the amount of, such other cash or in-kind assistance, the Federal supplemental compensation declined by the individual shall not be considered as available to such individual. The choice to decline eligibility for Federal supplemental compensation shall terminate any rights to such compensation.

"(3)(A) For purposes of this subsection, the terms '5-percent period', '4-percent period', '3-percent period', and 'low-unemployment period' mean, with respect to any State, the period which—

"(i) begins with the 3d week after the 1st week in which the rate of insured unemployment in the State for the period consisting of such week and the immediately preceding 12 weeks falls in the applicable range, and

"(ii) ends with the 3d week after the 1st week in which the rate of insured unemployment for the period consisting of such work and the immediately preceding 12 weeks does not fall within the applicable range.

"(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A), the applicable range is as follows:

"(D) For purposes of this subsection—

"(i) the rate of insured unemployment for any period shall be determined in the same manner as determined for purposes of section 203 of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970; and

"(4)(A) If the application of the provisions of this paragraph results in a higher applicable limit for a State under paragraph (2), the applicable limit for such State for purposes of paragraph (2) shall be determined under this paragraph, rather than under paragraph (3).

"(B) A State shall be deemed to be in a '5-percent period', '4-percent period,' or '3-percent period' for a week if—

"(C) For purposes of subparagraph (B), the applicable range is as follows:

In the case of weeks during a:	The applicable range is:
5-percent period	A rate equal to or exceeding 11 percent.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF FSC PROVISIONS

SEC. 4. (a) The amendments made by sections 2 and 3 shall apply to weeks beginning after September 30, 1983.

(b) In the case of any eligible individual—

(1) to whom any Federal supplemental compensation was payable for any week beginning before October 1, 1983, and

(2) who exhausted his rights to such compensation (by reason of the payment of all the amount of his Federal supplemental compensation account) before the first week beginning after September 30, 1983.

such individual's eligibility for additional weeks of compensation by reason of the amendments made by this Act shall not be limited or terminated by reason of any event, or failure to meet any requirement of law relating to eligibility for unemployment compensation, occurring after the date of such exhaustion of rights and before October 1, 1983 (and the period after such exhaustion and before October 1, 1983, shall not be counted for purposes of determining the expiration of the two years following the end of his benefit year for purposes of section 602(b) of the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act of 1982).

(c) The Secretary of Labor shall, at the earliest practicable date after the date of the enactment of this Act, propose to each State with which he has in effect an agreement under section 602 of the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act of 1982 a modification of such agreement designed to provide for the payment of Federal supplemental compensation under such Act in accordance with the amendments made by sections 2 and 3. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, if any State fails or refuses, within the 3-week period beginning on the date the Secretary of Labor proposed such a modification to such State, to enter into such a modification of such agreement, the Secretary of Labor shall terminate such agreement effective with the end of the last week which ends on or before the first day of such 3-week period.

STUDY OF UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS

SEC. 4A. The Secretary of Labor, in conjunction with the Congressional Research Service, shall conduct a study, and shall report the results of such study to Congress not later than May 15, 1984, with respect to alternatives to the rate of insured unemployment which would be available, or should be made available, with respect to all States, which would provide a more accurate measurement of the employment and labor market situation in each State and a more accurate and equitable determinant of the extent of need in each State for unemployment insurance benefits beyond regular compensation.

SENSE OF CONGRESS WITH RESPECT TO UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION STRUCTURAL CHANGES

SEC. 4B. It is the sense of the Congress that the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives should each expeditiously undertake studies and conduct hearings concerning the need to reform the fundamental structure and benefits of those unemployment compensation programs which are in addition to State regular compensation, and that each committee should report appropriate legislation necessary to carry out the committee's findings prior to June 1, 1984.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, as a preliminary matter, although my discussion will not be that long, while there are Members on the floor, I would ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished minority leader and a number of colleagues on both sides of the aisle, I offer an amendment which represents an interim proposal. We believe this proposal will be an appropriate measure for the next 9 months until the Senate has an opportunity to review the comprehensive proposal that the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) and the distinguished minority leader will offer. My amendment embodies the simple notion that we are no longer satisfied with the insured unemployment rate, upon which we determine the weeks of Federal supplemental benefits for which a State is eligible.

Several Members of this body have expressed reservation concerning the total unemployment rate. Different States, of course, have quite different situations. Yet, I argue that the total unemployment rate is superior to the insured rate. The basic problem of the insured rate is that it does not count those whose eligibility has expired. One major problem is that there may be a situation during which the insured unemployment rate declines, while economic activity declines as well. The statistics, then, often do not reveal the true unemployment problem.

Mr. President, unemployment insurance is an old story. It dates back to Great Britain, the first country to introduce unemployment insurance. The first unemployment insurance bill was carried in the House of Commons by Winston Churchill, at that time a very young man. He accomplished something that it was said could not be done. His opponents argued that one could not accurately measure unemployment.

As a matter of fact the statisticians already knew enough about sampling to argue that unemployment could be measured. What could be measured was the insurance coverage of employed persons and the firms providing that insurance.

We did not adopt unemployment insurance until 1935. We created unemployment insurance based on the principle that one is insured if the employer met certain requirements, such as the number of employees. At first, agriculture employees were left out, as were small firms. Gradually the system became more universal.

After World War II, we began to perfect our sampling techniques, enabling the Bureau of Labor Statistics to state with considerable accuracy the total unemployment rate. It might interest the Senate to know that we used to measure that rate only once every 10 years in the decennial census. The decennial census takes place in the spring. We conducted the decennial census in the spring of 1930 and the spring of 1940. By the spring of 1930, the Great Depression had not truly started. By the spring of 1940, however, employment began to increase, so we went through the whole depression and never were able to measure the real unemployment rate. Scholars still argue today over the level of unemployment.

After World War II, the Bureau of Labor Statistics began introducing the first total unemployment rate statistics. Then the total rate was broken into various categories: by sex, race, age, and finally on a State-by-State basis. This represented a normal development in math and statistical science. It is now fully developed. The Bureau of Labor Statistics each month reports a total unemployment rate for each of the 50 States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia.

The distinguished minority leader has called attention to the fact that we still continue with the arrangements which are similar to those in place in 1935 when we had no alternative. We knew little about the total rate in 1935. We only knew the number of persons who went to an employment office, which later came to be known as unemployment offices, to apply for unemployment insurance. A record of applications and certifications was kept, indicating the total number of insured workers. From this, we could easily derive the rate of insured workers. We could not measure any other index of employment.

That was in 1935—a full half century ago. The situation today is vastly different. Today, we can define the total unemployment rate with considerable accuracy.

I would offer the Senate advice in the theory of sampling with great trepidation. I do not pretend to grasp the theory in its entirety. Yet it happens to be the case, that a well drawn sample provides sound measurement of the total unemployment rate. We know there is not a person in this body who has not dealt with samples and polling, knowing how accurate they can be. The legislation I offer, on behalf of the minority leader and several of my colleagues, addresses a profound problem. I believe that we adequately address that problem.

We are dealing here with a lay issue of considerable impact.

Mr. Gary Burtless recently published in the Brookings papers on economic activity findings about the startling difference between the experience of American workers in the recession of 1975 and, if I may use Dr. Stigler's designation, the depression of 1982.

In 1975, more than 78 percent of all unemployed Americans were receiving unemployment benefits. In 1982, only 45 percent of our jobless were covered by the unemployment system.

These are startling figures, worthy of our utmost attention. That is why some of us in this body are advocating comprehensive revision of the unemployment system.

Let me cite just one example. The Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Kansas have already said that they recognize the problems we confront.

In 1983, the insured unemployment rate has dropped from 4.5 to 3.2 percent. That is a decline of 29 percent. But the total unemployment, the real unemployment, has declined from 10.2 to 9.5, a mere 7 percent.

Perhaps nothing is more confusing than to talk about percents of percents, but there is a 4-to-1 ratio in the decline of the insured rate against the real unemployment rate. The real unemployment rate is not reflected in the statistics we now use to calculate the weeks of benefits.

We propose that during the next 9 months the States be given the option to use their insured unemployment rate, if they think that is best, or their total unemployment rate. The State would use either rate, whichever was more favorable. Mr. President, I know it is difficult to keep in mind a scale, but I will read one so the record will show the options proposed: If a State's insured rate is 5 percent or more, or if its real rate is 11 percent or more, there will be 14 weeks of supplemental compensation; between 4 and 5 percent insured unemployed or 10 and 11 percent real unemployment, there will be 12 weeks; between 3 and 4 percent insured unemployed and 8 to 10 real unemployed, there will be 9 weeks, and, finally, under 3 percent insured unemployment or under 8 percent total unemployment there would be 7 weeks of FSC benefits.

This adds for States with the insured rate above 5 percent IUR an extra 2 weeks of benefits, and it adds similar amounts down to the second tier. Its would add 1 week to the two lowest tiers, compared with the Finance Committee bill.

My amendment also has a reach-back provision for those who have exhausted all benefits after April 1, 1983. Those unfortunate unemployed persons will get an additional 4 weeks of benefits, providing assistance to those long-term unemployed who have exhausted their insurance and do not yet have a job.

Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong the debate. I would only point out that because this is a 9-month measure, the cost is well below the bill we have before us. It will enable us to give consideration to a more comprehensive bill.

My amendment also mandates the Secretary of Labor to study and report to Congress on alternatives to the present unemployment system and states that it is the sense of the Congress that the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee expeditiously undertake studies and conduct hearings concerning general reform of the unemployment insurance system. We must undertake these studies. Every half century or so a social insurance program needs to be reevaluated and restructured. That is what we have in mind.

For the moment, we have a measure which is fair. No one can say it is not fair. If you feel the insured rate is best, then use it. If you feel the real unemployment rate is best, then the States will be able to use that measure. States will have the option to optimize their circumstance. There is also an increase in the number of weeks of eligibility in each category. In the main, I think we will be doing right for the work force which did not bring about this extended period of economic decline, the deepest since the Depression of the 1930's.

Mr. President, I yield the floor. I see the distinguished Senator from Kansas is prepared to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am certain the Senator has properly stated the case, but I simply hope he loses.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Would the Senator be kind enough to let me correct my own error? I said an amendment but I should have said an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. DOLE. In either event I am opposed to it.

Mr. President, I would just say that we have a good bill here, an 18-month extension. We were told by some of the labor witnesses they would like to have a permanent FSC program. I say very honestly that we have an election coming up in 1984. I think the last thing we ought to do—and I do not suggest this is the intention of the Senator from New York—is to bring this up every 3 months, 6 months, or 9 months. But a short duration means we have to address the issue again.

We believe we have provided a pretty sound piece of legislation. We believe we have almost reached the maximum cost that some of those in higher authority will accept. This bill for a 9-month duration would cost about $2.86 billion. That is the CBO estimate based on the first resolution employment assumptions. Over the 18-month period, the Finance Committee bill would cost about $3.6 billion.

As I understand, the cost would rise in this amendment to about $4.7 billion over an 18-month period.

We have just discussed the TUR, the total unemployment rate. We had a good colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. It is an area we are studying. There may be a better way to go. But it seems to me that we modified the IUR to take care of some of the concerns of the States with heavy unemployment, long and enduring unemployment. I would hope we would not launch into some new way to measure it.

Third, the amendment provides reach-back benefits for individuals who have already exhausted their earlier entitlements under the program. This is an expensive proposition with a cost ranging from $60 to $80 million per week.

The provisions of the bill using a TUR trigger and adding additional benefits would create serious administrative problems for the States already confused by the multitiers and constantly changing nature of the FSC program.

I have a letter from ICESA—the Interstate Conference of State Employment Security Agencies. It indicates that this program is so complicated now because Congress changes direction every 3 to 6 months. We say, well, you get this much every 4 or 6 weeks, then we change that to 8 to 12 weeks. The bottom line that ICESA believes the House program could not be administered if it is enacted. The ICESA letter follows:

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: We are aware that the House Ways and Means Committee has adopted a 45-day extension of the Federal Supplemental Compensation program that includes substantial changes in its structure. Our organization and others testified before both the Senate Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee about the complications and confusion that have resulted from the three different versions of the program that have been implemented in the last year. Each time the program is changed, computers have to be programmed, new procedures developed, staff trained, and explanations made to unemployed workers. This is a massive undertaking in each of the fifty-three (53) states and jurisdictions. Asking the system to implement a new program in less than a week, with no assurance that it will not change six weeks later, will only multiply the existing confusion.

In attempting to implement a new program by October 1, there will likely be delays in issuing checks since the number of weeks each unemployed worker is entitled to will have to be re-calculated under the new program's provisions. Because we will be under pressure to make payments as quickly as possible, there will be more errors and inaccurate payments than we would like to see.

If the Congress intends to make a brief extension of the FSC program, we urge you to simply extend the provisions of current law. More substantial changes should be made far enough in advance to permit us to implement them in an orderly fashion and avoid disruptions in the payment of benefits.

ICESA's staff an membership would be pleased to work with you and provide advice from our perspective as administrators of the unemployment insurance program, as you consider extending the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act.

Sincerely,

A. BARCLAY GARDNER,
President, ICESA.

They are suggesting that if we start some new program now on October 1, there will be delays in getting checks out. That is clearly going to be a hardship on unemployed workers. I just suggest that we not launch into some new untried formula called TUR or whatever else at this late date. We will have, as I have indicated, extended hearings on the resolution introduced by Senator BYRD and Senator HEINZ.

I hope we might defeat this amendment and move on to the few other amendments that are remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. BINGAMAN) be added as a cosponsor. May I also ask that Mr. DIXON be added.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from West Virginia, the Democratic leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not want the distinguished chairman of the committee or the ranking member to feel offended that some of us are trying to deal with the problems of our States which have very serious problems. I would most want them to feel that this Senator is ungrateful for the actions of the committee in attempting to alleviate the problem. I can only be most appreciative of what the committee has done.

At the same time, I hope the chairman will understand that as the Senator from West Virginia, which has the highest unemployment rate in the Nation, I first have to be conscious of the needs of my people and their problems and what they expect of me as their Senator. For that reason, I commend the Senator from New York, who can speak on almost any subject—and does—and with a tremendous grasp of the historic background of whatever the subject may be. He was talking about Winston Churchill when he was in the House of Commons and how some of those who opposed Winston's position on the matter would say, "Well, those fellows will just spend their money on drink," and how Winston said, "Well, it is their money; let them spend it however they wish."

I did not originate that comment, because I knew nothing about it. But I just want to compliment him. He comes to the floor and joins the debate in a very engaging manner, one which reflects tremendous knowledge of the subject.

I am pleased to cosponsor the amendment. The unemployment insurance system is one of the most important protections for American workers. It is an essential contributor to national economic stability. I can remember when we did not have it. This is no spring chicken here talking. I may not have learned as much as the distinguished Senator from New York has learned in his years, but a great deal of what I learned, I learned the hard way and it has stuck with me. I can remember when we did not have any unemployment compensation program at all. So it is a contributor to our national economic stability.

One need not have looked very closely to see this amply demonstrated during the past 2 years of economic stagnation. For tens of thousands of Americans and their families, the unemployment system is all that stood between them and immediate destitution when they were laid off from their jobs.

Sadly, however, it has been all too obvious during this same period that the system has distressing flaws—I referred to a few moments ago, flaws that have been referred to by the chairman, by Mr. HEINZ, Mr. DIXON, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. LEVIN, and others, either on the floor or off the floor, or both. They are most destructive when unemployment is the highest and a stable unemployment insurance system is most badly needed: The way in which the system has determined how many weeks of unemployment benefits will be available to the jobless in various States has defied all logic. At particular points, States with unemployment rates as high as 15 percent have been eligible for only 34 weeks of benefits when the system professes to provide a maximum of 53 weeks of benefits to areas with high unemployment. Currently only two States are eligible for the extended benefits program despite the fact that half the States have total unemployment rates 9 percent or higher—severe unemployment by historical standards. Studies have established that only 45 percent of the unemployed received benefits during 1892, compared with 78 percent in the recession year of 1975.

Only a total overhaul of the system will offer a really satisfactory remedy for these problems. On August 4, with Senator HEINZ and several cosponsors, I introduced a bill that would restructure the system coherently. That bill currently is before both the Senate Finance and the House Ways and Means Committees. They have concluded that they must devote more time to study its provisions before acting on it, and I respect there determination in this regard. Consequently, the only provisions before us today pertain to extending the Federal supplemental compensation of FSC program before it expires tomorrow night at midnight.

Yet, even if comprehensive reform of the UI system must be delayed, I join Senator MOYNIHAN and the other cosponsors of this amendment from both parties in the belief that it would not be responsible to delay taking any steps to remedy the serious deficiencies that have appeared in the UI programs.

The amendment before the Senate does five things, principally. Two of its objectives are to increase the aid the bill provides. Three of its objectives are directed to the fundamental problems begging for reform.

First. It is my opinion that the reductions from current law in weeks of benefits provided under the committee bill are simply unacceptable. Although the 7, 9, 12, and 14 weeks provided under the amendment are not as much as I believe is warranted, particularly for areas of highest unemployment, they are more nearly so than the 6, 8, 10, and 12 weeks the committee provides.

Second. I also am persuaded that this Congress has a responsibility to aid the most distressed of the unemployed—those who have been unemployed for so long that they have exhausted all available benefits including FSC, but still cannot find work. The Congress included a so-called reachback provision in the FSC amendments contained in the social security bill in March of this year to help exhaustees. The House Ways and Means Committee has included such a provision in the FSC extension it has reported. The Finance Committee did not include such a provision. The reachback in the Moynihan amendment is extremely modest—only 4 weeks to those who have exhausted benefits since April 1. But those 4 weeks will be a matter of economic life or death for many who will receive them if the Congress makes them available. Its cost is only $185 million. In my view, it is the least the Congress can do for these poor victims of a malfunctioning economy.

Third. The bill also addresses head on one of the most damaging flaws the system demonstrated over the past year—the total inadequacy of the insured unemployment rate or IUR as the sole determinant of how many weeks of FSC a State can receive. The gap between the IUR and the total unemployment rate or TUR has been growing steadily over the past several years. The IUR has proven itself to be unreliable as the benefit duration determinant in the FSC program and the eligibility determinant in the extended benefits program.

Several Senators, including Senator HEINZ and me, earlier in the debate on this bill went into much greater detail on the inadequacy of the IUR, and I do not intend to consume the time of the Senate now to recover all of that discussion.

To ameliorate the results of that inadequacy, although the Moynihan amendment does not reject any use of the IUR—which I believe would be an imprudently hasty step to take at this time, the amendment does allow a State to use its TUR as an alternative determinant of benefit duration in the FSC program. This will prevent recurrence of the situation all too frequent during the past year where States with the highest total unemployment rates were eligible for only the minimum number of weeks of FSC benefits. In my own State of West Virginia, where the TUR remains above 17 percent, the IUR continues to fall. In the absence of this amendment's adoption, my State could fall to a lower benefit level while still having oppressive total unemployment—despite the presence of the alternative eligibility determinant included by the committee in the bill.

I am quite aware of the criticisms leveled at the TUR as a benefit or eligibility determination device in unemployment insurance programs. I readily admit that it is far from ideal for this purpose. But I submit that the IUR is a proven failure in delivering benefits the Congress intended to provide to States with demonstrable need, and I am convinced that the TUR will help remedy this problem even if imperfectly. Further, the alternative calculation incorporating the IUR that the committee proposes to permit is simply not a sufficient response to the severity and permanence of the problem. Although I appreciate what I believe was the committee's good faith attempt to address the IUR's problems, adopting it would be something like applying weak, water-soluble ointment to injuries. As long as the injured persons can stay out of the water—and as long as it does not rain—the ointment may work suitably. But when the first storm breaks, those that get wet are out of luck. The Senate should not be satisfied with that kind of solution, and should try using the TUR.

Fourth. The other step the Moynihan amendment takes in response to the inadequacy of the IUR is to require the Department of Labor and the Congressional Research Service to conduct a study, and report findings to the Congress by May 15 of next year, concerning preferable benefit duration and eligibility determinants. Both those seeking alternative use of the TUR today, as well as many of those opposing its use, admit that the IUR is flawed and the TUR is not a perfect replacement. But we are stymied by the fact that none of the program experts has been able to devise a better determinant. I can assure the Senate that we not only will be stymied if we again are forced to consider this issue without careful study and research having been conducted in the meantime; we will look extremely foolish. Wisdom demands that such a study begin now.

Fifth. The final element of the Moynihan amendment is similarly important. I noted earlier that the UI system needs fundamental reform. And yet, understandably in many respects, the Congress often finds itself consumed by the crises of the moment and unable to address simmering problems which later became conflagrations. It is my fervent hope that the Congress will not let the need for UI reform slide until we again are pushed face-to-face with the system's inadequacies when another recession stretches the system beyond its ability to contend as occurred over the past 2 years. We should act soon, while the memory of the system's failings is fresh in our minds. The Moynihan amendment expresses the sense of the Congress that the Ways and Means and Finance Committees should undertake a careful examination of the program and should report legislation by June 1 of next year to their respective houses reflecting their judgments on how it should be reformed.

The Moynihan amendment is a reasonable package. Its cost is modest. It will cost only approximately $580 million more than the committee's bill over the 9 months of its duration. Its adoption will give the Congress added incentive to act next spring to adopt needed basic systemic reforms, and will assure that the information with which to make sound, careful judgments is available. And in the meantime, it will provide more adequate levels of benefits to those who have exhausted all other unemployment benefits.

Having said that, Mr. President, I support the amendment offered by Mr. MOYNIHAN. I urge its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, before we vote, I wish to express my appreciation for the minority leader's gracious remarks and add my own to those which he extended to the chairman of the committee. He has introduced an important piece of legislation. If by chance, we are not successful in this regard, all of us will be very happy to support his measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think we are prepared to vote. I say to my colleagues who may be listening that, following disposition of the amendment, we hope to move quickly on a couple of amendments that there is no dispute on. Then there will be, I think, three or four other amendments that there may be votes on.

I say this again: This is a very sensitive issue. Obviously, if we had a lot of money, we could do a lot of things and pay everybody more money over longer times and reach back farther and have formulas to liberalize the program. If we extended this beyond 9 months, this is $2.9 billion for a 9-month program. Ours is $3.6 billion for an 18-month program. Let us face it, if we find some areas that have to be addressed, even in an 18-month program, we can do it. I hope we can defeat this amendment and move on to other amendments that are pending and try to conclude action on this bill by 7 o'clock, or 7:15. If not, we shall take it up again tomorrow.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—A SYSTEM IN NEED OF REPAIR

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I have stood on this floor and addressed the problem of the unemployment system often in the past year and a half. It is not an easy matter to discuss—the terminology is technical, the program is made up of tiers of benefits and tiers of triggers, calculations and percentages, billions of dollars and a complicated tax structure. Further, a majority of States have borrowed from the Federal Government to pay benefits to their jobless workers and are deeply in debt.

Unfortunately, in all of the rhetoric and technical discussions, the people who have worked hard their whole lives and find themselves out of work—the people for whom the system was created—often are overlooked. They are superceded by IUR's and TUR's. By EB and FSC, by reachbacks and grandfather clauses.

There is one thing that continues to be painfully apparent to me, as well as to many others. The current method of calculating how these people qualify for the benefits they so desperately need is wholly inadequate. The insured unemployment rate, or IUR, does not represent the difficulty a person has in finding work. It does not bear the slightest resemblance to the total number of people who are unemployed, or those who were eligible for benefits but have long since exhausted them.

I have sponsored legislation with Senator LEVIN to address the inadequacy of the IUR—S. 1589. We believe that until a better way can be devised, the total unemployment rate, or TUR, is the best measure of which States are in the deepest distress. I have joined Senators BYRD and HEINZ in S. 1784, a comprehensive reform of this complex and piecemeal system, which I believe is greatly needed and should be addressed so that a permanent system that works is in place during all phases of the business cycle to address the changing needs of people.

My own State of Illinois had a total unemployment rate of 11.5 percent in July of this year. In contrast, the State's average insured unemployment rate was 4.87 percent. In August, the State's TUR rose to 11.7 percent, while the IUR fell to 4.46 percent. In the week ending September 10, Illinois IUR was 3.55 percent and is continuing to fall. A ridiculous situation, I am sure you will agree.

In a sense, I am happy to see some recognition on the part of the distinguished chairman and ranking member of the Finance Committee that the insured unemployment rate does not work as it is. The committee bill incorporates an alternative trigger, which attempts to address the long-term distress of many of our States. By reaching back to January of 1982, when insured unemployment rates were higher, and including all those months rather than limiting it to a current 13-week average, it does, in a sense, count those who later exhausted their first 26 weeks of benefits—those who are or were eligible for extended benefits and Federal supplemental compensation. It is not the alternative trigger that I would prefer—the total unemployment rate—but it does give credence to the cries of many of us in this place that the system is in desperate need of attention.

Another point I feel that it is necessary to make here is that the original basis for the Federal supplemental compensation program was that 10 high unemployment States were no longer qualified to pay the 13 weeks of extended benefits—the second tier of the system, which is funded equally by the States and the Federal Government. It was meant as a replacement, in a sense, for the long-term unemployed who were still unable to find work, but had a significant attachment to the work force. That system has now totally deteriorated. Only two States—West Virginia and Louisiana—are eligible to pay these benefits, and the latter is painfully close to losing its eligibility.

Therefore, any FSC program that we devise should address the loss of weeks of benefits that are now a reality. A replacement of 12 weeks, as suggested by the committee proposal, is fewer weeks than we lost under the EB program. Many States, 26 to be exact, will receive fewer weeks than are currently available under FSC.

At this point, I would like to insert into the RECORD a table showing each State's most recent total unemployment rate, its cumulative insured rate from January of 1982 through June of 1983, the number of weeks of FSC currently available to each State, the number of weeks which would be available under the committee bill, and the number of weeks available under our proposal.

Finally, I would like to mention a provision of our amendment which I believe to be most constructive: The requiring of a study by the Labor Department and the Congressional Research Service of alternatives to the insured unemployment rate, which would provide a more accurate measure of the employment and labor market situation in each State. This is long overdue, and would help Congress address this program and its problems with a more enlightened calculation.

We must not lose sight of why we are here, and who we are attempting to serve, in the passage of an extension of this program. There are 647,000 people in my State who are waiting for us to help them. There are 11 million unemployed workers throughout this great land who need for us to come to grips with this program and with our responsibility. There are faces and tragic stories behind these numbers and acronyms and percentages. We must not forget them.

The table follows:

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I support of the amendment offered by Senator MOYNIHAN because it takes into account the total unemployment rate (TUR) and not just the insured unemployment rate (IUR). Under the Finance Committee bill, some States with unemployment rates well in excess of 10 percent would be penalized because their IUR is as much as 10 percent or more below the TUR.

In addition, this amendment includes a "reach back" provision which would provide 4 weeks of unemployment compensation to those workers who have exhausted benefits since the current program was authorized on April 1, 1983. Historically, as many as 70 to 80 percent of unemployed workers have been eligible for unemployment compensation. This figure has dropped to an alltime low of 38 percent. The current system, whereby fewer unemployed workers than anytime in history are actually eligible for benefits, is clearly unacceptable. Throughout my travels in Pennsylvania, including town meetings and visits to unemployment offices in all segments of the State, I have heard of many great human suffering caused by the cutoff of these benefits.

In my judgment, the unemployment of more than 10,000,000 Americans, including 620,000 Pennsylvanians, calls for passage of the amendment.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. It directly addresses two difficiencies in the Finance Committee's bill.

First, it breaks new ground by utilizing the concept of the total unemployment rate—TUR—as an alternative to the measure of insured unemployment rate—IUR—which is in current law and in the committee bill. The total unemployment rate focuses on the number of people out of work and looking for jobs. It is the figure normally referred to when people talk about unemployment. The insured unemployment rate focuses on people who are out of work and receiving State unemployment benefits.

In the course of the recession, it became increasingly clear that the IUR is woefully inadequate as a measure of State's economic distress and need for unemployment benefits. The use of the IUR has resulted in a reduction in the number of weeks of benefits for the unemployed in States which still have extraordinarily high unemployment rates. Let me cite the example of my own State of Michigan. In May the total unemployment rate in Michigan was 14.9 percent and Michigan was eligible for 53 weeks of unemployment benefits. By August, unemployment in Michigan had dropped only by about half a percentage point, but the maximum number of weeks of eligibility for unemployment benefits had dropped precipitiously to 36 weeks. In other words, there was a 17-week drop in the number of weeks of unemployment compensation available in response to only a very modest decline in Michigan's unemployment rate.

This dropoff in the number of weeks resulted from Michigan's triggering off in June from the 13-week extended benefit program and the loss of 4 weeks of Federal supplemental compensation. And this decline in benefits was mandated by a decline in Michigan's insured unemployment rate. Mr. President, it is impossible to tell someone who has just been told that their unemployment benefits have been cut that such a reduction is necessary due to an obscure governmental formula which he neither understands nor which comports with the unemployment situation which they see around them. Here in Congress we work with formulas, we crunch numbers, we worry about legislative style. And we have to do this. But through the eyes of many of the unemployed, we have sacrificed compassion for the benefit of mathematical equations.

But it is not only through their eyes that things have gone wrong. In the words of a study conducted on behalf of the U.S. Department of Labor with respect to the divergence between the IUR and the TUR, "the Insured Unemployment Rate should be temporarily retired as a serious measure of labor market conditions."

Therefore, the amendment before us takes the reasonable and realistic step of providing the total unemployment rate as a measure of a State's eligibility for FSC benefits.

Second, this amendment recognizes that we are now providing the continuing victims of the recession far fewer weeks of unemployment benefits than we did during the 1975 recession. In 1975, when unemployment was in the 8-percent range we provided 65 weeks of unemployment benefits. In 1983 when unemployment is over 9 percent—and likely to remain there for quite some time—most States are eligible for 36 weeks or less of unemployment benefits. I would like to see even more weeks of benefits than are provided for in this amendment for the hardest hit States. But I think that it is a significant improvement over the assistance provided in the committee bill, and worthwhile of our support.

NOT VOTING—7

Cranston	Sarbanes	Weicker
Hart	Stafford
Nunn	Tower

So Mr. MOYNIHAN's amendment (No. 2247) was rejected.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if we may have order, I wish to tell my colleagues what we think we might be able to do rather quickly.

There are two or three amendments that are not controversial. Senator BAUCUS has an amendment. Senator HAWKINS has an amendment. Senator STAFFORD has a technical amendment. I know that Senator MITCHELL has an uncontroversial amendment with reference to judges. The amendment by Mr. COHEN might be controversial.

We hope we may dispose of the noncontroversial amendments and then take up those that may require extended debate or a rollcall vote. I think Senator BAUCUS is ready to offer his noncontroversial amendment.

AMENDMENT NO 2248

(Purpose: To authorize funds for the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation)

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUDMAN). The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS), for himself, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. BAKER, Mr. BYRD, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. SASSER, Mr. BENTSEN, and Mr. DOLE, proposes an amendment numbered 2248.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill, add the following new section:

MAUREEN AND MIKE MANSFIELD FOUNDATION

SEC. . (a) The Secretary of Education is authorized to provide financial assistance in accordance with the provisions of this section to the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation to assist in the development of the Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs and the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Center at the University of Montana.

(b) No financial assistance provided under this section may be made except upon an application at such time, in such manner, and containing such information as the Secretary of Education may require.

(c) There are authorized to be appropriated such sums, not to exceed $5,000,000, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. Funds appropriated pursuant to this section shall remain available until expended.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, this amendment is the same as the bill I introduced, S. 1905, to establish the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation. The bill has been cosponsored by Senators BAKER, BYRD, INOUYE, MELCHER, SASSER, BENTSEN, and DOLE.

The Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation has been created to support two important organizations: the Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs and the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Center at the University of Montana.

Together, these two centers will honor the career of Mike Mansfield, the longest-serving majority leader in the history of the U.S. Senate. Currently the American Ambassador to Japan, Mike Mansfield is truly an American statesman and a world leader.

The centers also honor the contributions of Mike's wife, Maureen Mansfield. As Mike said upon his retirement from the Senate:

My conclusion has been reached in this instance with my wife, Maureen Hayes Mansfield, who has been with me through all these years and whose sensitive counsel, deep understanding, and great love have been so much a part of whatever may be the sum of my contribution.

The Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs, to be constructed at Flathead Lake in northwestern Montana, will bring leaders in business, government, and cultural affairs from nations of the Pacific to participate in conferences and seminars on the developing economic and cultural ties in this region. We expect that the center will host more than 60 such meetings each year on subjects ranging from agricultural trade to educational exchange programs.

The center's progress is keyed to the unparalleled growth which has characterized trade in the Pacific basin during the past two decades. This growth is expected to continue into the 21st century. The center will work to foster economic growth through trade, and will also be a leader in improving international understanding and in eliminating cultural barriers which have impeded exchanges across the Pacific.

The Maureen and Mike Mansfield Center at the University of Montana will conduct academic programs related to Pacific area studies, ethics, and public affairs. The university programs will open new opportunities for research and study, and attract leaders from academic and public life.

These two centers will sponsor cooperative programs designed to build upon their complementary relationships, such as hosting major conferences on Pacific area political, cultural, and trade relations.

The State of Montana has already appropriated $1 million to the Mansfield Foundation, which will coordinate fundraising activities for these two centers. This bill authorizes an additional $5 million to be appropriated from Federal funds, as a one-time appropriation to help establish the centers.

The foundation will seek additional funds from individual donors, and we expect substantial donations from Japanese and other Pacific sources once Ambassador Mansfield retires from his post in Japan.

I believe it is fitting and proper that the United States should honor Mike Mansfield in this way. These two centers will honor his career by supporting and continuing his lifelong efforts to achieve close relations with Pacific nations in every sense.

Mr. President, many friends of Mike and colleagues of ours have joined in this effort. The majority leader, Mr. BAKER, and the minority leader, Mr. BYRD, served on the founding committee for the foundation, along with Senator DANNY INOUYE, the late Senator Scoop Jackson, and House Speaker TIP O'NEILL.

Stan Kimmit, former Secretary to the Senate, served on the initial planning group and is a member of the board of the Mansfield Foundation. The foundation is chaired by the Honorable Ted Schwinden, Governor of Montana.

Mr. President, I hope my colleagues will support this amendment. I plan to ask the Senate to include funds for this important foundation in the 1984 Labor/HHS appropriations bill. I am sure the Senate will want to support this effort, to honor Mike Mansfield and to continue the important work he has started.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this amendment has been reviewed and cleared on this side. We are willing to accept the amendment. I understand the Senator from Louisiana has no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS).

The amendment (No. 2248) was agreed to.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2249

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS) proposes an amendment numbered 2249.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 8 after line 7 add the following:

SEC. . TREATMENT OF CERTAIN AGRICULTURAL LABOR

Subparagraph (B) of section 3306(c)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to agricultural labor) is amended by striking out "January 1, 1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "January 1, 1986".

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I rise to offer a noncontroversial amendment extending the treatment of H-2 guest workers under the unemployment insurance program for 2 years. Since the beginning of the H-2 program many years ago, Congress has recognized that it would be unfair to force employers to pay unemployment taxes on workers who by law cannot collect unemployment benefits. Since these workers return to their own countries after completing their work here, and are not U.S. residents, they do not qualify for unemployment benefits and therefore receive none.

This amendment extends current law until January 1, 1986, and is identical to the provision which is in the House passed version of this bill.

I understand that the chairman of the committee has agreed to accept it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this exemption will expire December 31, 1983. The Hawkins amendment, is contained in the House bill H.R. 3929. This has been an exemption of long standing. I know of no objection to the amendment. I think it was an oversight that it was not included in the bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I am not familiar with the amendment. I would appreciate it if someone would show it to me.

Mr. President, I have now had an opportunity to examine the amendment. I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS).

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I do not know whether the distinguished Senator from Maine is ready. I probably gave him misinformation. Does the Senator want to do his amendment now?

Mr. MITCHELL. I can have it in just a moment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wonder if we might take that amendment and then move on to the amendment of the other Senator from Maine, Senator COHEN.

AMENDMENT NO. 2250

(Purpose: To delay for two years the coverage under social security for retired Federal judges on active duty)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL) proposes an amendment numbered 2250.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

SOCIAL SECURITY COVERAGE OF RETIRED FEDERAL JUDGES ON ACTIVE DUTY

Sec. . Notwithstanding section 101(d) of the Social Security Amendments of 1983, the amendments made by section 101(c) of such Act shall apply only with respect to remuneration paid after December 31, 1985. Remuneration paid prior to January 1, 1986 under section 371(b) of title 28, United States Code, to an individual performing service under section 294 of such title, shall not be included in the term "wages" for purposes of section 209 of the Social Security Act or section 3121(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, my amendment would delay by 2 years the recently enacted provision that would treat as earnings for social security purposes compensation received by retired Federal judges who continue to perform judicial services. This provision is currently scheduled to take effect on January 1, 1984.

My amendment would restore the law to what had been previously.

I believe that this provision was hastily enacted and that the Congress needs more time to evaluate fully the potential impact of this measure.

Upon retirement, Federal judges can choose to enter senior status. When they do so they voluntarily offer to continue performing their judicial services. These services are a major contribution to the Federal judiciary, as retired judges share the ever-increasing workload of the Federal courts.

Title I of the Social Security Amendments of 1983 has two provisions affecting Federal judges. The first extends social security coverage to Federal judges. My amendment would not change this provision. The second provision treats as wages, for purposes of the social security system, compensation paid to retired judges who continue in active duty. My amendment would delay this provision for 2 years.

I believe that this provision creates significant financial disincentives for retired judges to continue their judicial work. First, most obviously, they will be subject to the social security payroll tax, beginning in 1984. Second, because of the earnings limit, most retired judges between the ages of 65 and 70 will not receive whatever social security benefits they are entitled to receive.

Because of these disincentives, I am concerned that we run the risk of losing the services of many retired judges. To compensate for the loss of these services, Congress may well have to add additional judgeships to cope with existing caseloads, at a considerably greater expense. In addition to these undesirable effects on the judicial system and on the budget, this provision is simply unfair as it applies to current retired judges, who had agreed to continue service on terms that did not include social security coverage.

I do not believe that these factors were adequately taken into consideration when the social security bill was approved by the Congress. In fact, the Senate did not debate this provision at all; it was a provision of the House bill that was accepted in conference.

Earlier this year I introduced S. 1276, which contained an outright repeal of this provision. Nine other Senators have cosponsored S. 1276.

I recognize, however, that given differing views on this issue and the need to act soon, a 2-year delay is a reasonable step. I urge my colleagues to support my amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me thank the distinguished Senator from Maine. I would be happy to join as a cosponsor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. I would say, in the first instance, this was not in the Finance Committee bill, the Senate bill, or in the social security compromise reached by the National Commission on Social Security Reform. It was insisted upon by the House in conference.

I discussed this matter with the Chief Justice several months ago in his quarters. It is a matter of some urgency and certainly no one can better articulate that than the distinguished Senator from Maine, who has been a Federal judge himself. This amendment would correct what I consider to be a potential mistake in the legislation, and I hope it can be accepted.

Mr. President, the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Maine will delay the effective date of section 101(c) of the Social Security Amendments of 1983. The provision in the new law, effective January 1, 1984, modifies the treatment of compensation for certain Federal judges. In particular, senior judges—those who have retired from regular active service, but who still sit and perform judicial duties by assignment—would have their compensation treated as earnings for purposes of the social security retirement-earnings test and FICA taxes.

I believe this provision could have unintended and undesirable consequences. Beginning January 1, the 236 senior judges throughout the Nation would be provided with a strong financial incentive to retire. Because Federal judges receive the salary of the office for life, whether or not they perform judicial duties or fully retire, they effectively volunteer their services to the courts as senior judges. They receive no extra pay for their efforts, nor do they receive any less by fully retiring. Under the new provision, senior judges will be able to increase their total incomes by retiring, because while their compensation remains fixed, they would no longer pay FICA taxes or—until age 70—suffer any reduction of social security benefits under the retirement-earnings test.

Certainly there will be a strong incentive for Federal judges in senior status to cease performing judicial services rather than remain in senior status. Valuable services may be lost; the courts' backlog of cases may increase.

Mr. President, this provision was not adopted by the Senate Finance Committee, nor was it included in the Senate version of the Social security bill. The issue was not even raised during the deliberations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform. This was a House provision adopted in conference.

The amendment being offered is a simple one; it would delay the effective date of section 101(c) of the Social Security Act for 2 years—until January 1, 1986. This would allow us time to consider carefully the ramifications of this provision. I should point out that the coverage of Federal judges under social security will not be affected in any way by this amendment. All Federal judges will be covered under the social security system as of January 1, 1984.

Finally, it should be emphasized that we do not have the luxury of waiting until January to address this problem. The courts had planned to complete, this month, the process of setting their calendars for next year and deciding how many law clerks need to be hired. Clearly, they must be in a position of knowing just what their judicial resources will be, and how many senior judges will be available to perform judicial duties. At this point, everything is on hold, I am advised, pending some action by Congress. Several senior judges have already notified the Chief Justice of their intention to retire because of what they perceive to be the adverse economic consequences of section 101(c). Others have yet to make final decisions.

I urge my colleagues to support this amendment. The 2-year delay will provide us with the time we need to assess the ramifications of this provision on both social security and the Federal courts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am not opposed to the amendment, but I am familiar with the problem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. The Senator cannot be heard. The Senate will please be in order.

The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. There is a very severe problem, created by the so-called social security compromise that became law during this last year. Part of it is that when a retired Federal judge seeks to do some work on the call of his Government, he actually loses money.

While all those dedicated retired judges love this country, they do not love it so much that they want to have to pay or accept a cash penalty for the privilege of working for their Government.

The Senator seeks to strike at a problem and I hope he has properly formulated his amendment to correct it. In the event it fails to fully correct the problem, maybe we can correct it in conference.

I would hope that he has prepared it well enough so that he has found the answer to it because I am satisfied that the real problem should be corrected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered the distinguished Senator from Maine. Our senior Federal judges perform invaluable and selfless service to this country, and we can ill afford to lose their services because of a penalty which we inadvertently placed on them in our efforts to insure the solvency of the social security system. I would like to bring to the Senate's attention just a few facts concerning the work of the senior district and circuit judges, and I would like to especially call the Senate's attention to the work of two of Arkansas's most distinguished citizens who now serve as senior judges.

In the year ending June 30, 1982, in all of the U.S. district courts, senior judges conducted a total of 2,072 trials involving a total of 23,128.5 courtroom hours, and 10,914 noncourtroom hours. These proceedings terminated a total of 16,249 civil cases and criminal proceedings involving a total of 2,396 criminal defendents. In the same period, senior judges participated in 5,811 cases in all of the circuit courts of appeals. It could well be said that all this work was done at virtually no cost to the taxpayers, since each of these judges could just as easily have gone home and drawn his or her full retirement salary. In fact, the only cost associated with service by any of the senior judges is the cost of their staffs.

The Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts estimates that the 236 senior judges (both district and circuit) perform the workload of 40 to 50 active judges. For the court year ending June 30, 1983, senior judges terminated 8.6 percent of all civil cases closed that year and 5.5 percent of all criminal cases. These statistics, however, seriously understate the importance of senior judges in those courts which have particularly high caseloads, such as the eastern and western districts of Arkansas.

In this connection, one of Arkansas' most distinguished sons, Judge Oren Harris, deserves special commendation. Judge Harris' contributions to public service are almost without parallel. You will recall that he was elected to Congress in 1940 and served in the 12 succeeding Congresses—77th through 88th Congress—including a distingushed tenure as chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. In 1965, Judge Harris retired from the House and was appointed U.S. district judge by President Johnson. Judge Harris is now 80 years old, and continues to carry on a workload which would overwhelm most younger men. It is no exaggeration to say that the district court for the Western District of Arkansas would be unable to function without Judge Harris' work. On June 30, 1983, he had 265 cases on his docket in the Western District of Arkansas and 11 cases in the Eastern District of Arkansas. In the year ending June 30, 1982, Judge Harris closed 253 cases in the western district and 41 cases in the eastern district. In the year ending June 30, 1983, Judge Harris had actually increased his productivity and closed 294 cases in the western district and 35 cases in the eastern district. It should be noted further, that during this time, Judge Harris also found time to sit by special designation on the court of appeals on more than one occasion.

Arkansas' other distinguished senior judge, Hon. J. Smith Henley, also deserves special mention. Judge Henley was appointed U.S. district judge in 1957, and was elevated to the Court of Appeals for the eighth circuit in 1975. He has been a senior circuit judge since June 1, 1982. Since that time, Judge Henley has continued to perform the workload of an active judge. In the year ending June 30, 1983, Judge Henley authored 100 opinions and orders, disposing of cases before the court of appeals, and also heard cases in the district court for the Western District of Arkansas. In those 100 cases in the court of appeals, Judge Henley wrote 42 signed opinions, 19 published per curiam opinions, 41 unpublished per curiams, and 6 dissents. Judge Henley's service to the courts during the past year came at an especially crucial time since the eighth circuit was short one active judge because of the administration's failure to name Judge Henley's replacement until very recently.

Section 101(c), which subjects senior judges to the social security system, imposes a tremendous disincentive to public service. The cost to each senior judge between the ages of 65 and 70 of continuing to work has been estimated at from $5,000 to $10,000 annually if retirement salary continues to be treated as wages for FICA purposes. The cost varies somewhat, because for those judges under age 70, there is the added penalty against social security benefits to which the judge might be entitled from previous private sector employment—there is an offset against social security benefits for wages earned for those between 65 and 70. In addition, there is the cost of FICA deductions from wages. On the other hand, if the judges do not accept any work assignments, retirement salary is not considered FICA wages; there is no offset against social security benefits and, of course, there are no FICA taxes withheld.

I urge my colleagues to correct this disincentive to this great public service and support Senator MITCHELL'S amendment.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment of the Senator from Maine. There is an inequity as it pertains to Federal judges who go on senior status. A number of the judges in Illinois have communicated with me about this problem. I compliment the Senator—who is a former Federal judge himself—for recognizing and acting on this matter.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I support the distinguished Senator from Maine, Mr. MITCHELL, and commend him for his initiative in offering an amendment to the Federal supplemental compensation bill, which will delay for 2 years the impact of the recently enacted Social Security Amendments of 1983, insofar as they apply to retired Federal judges.

I am the sponsor of similar legislation, S. 1375, also intended to preserve this important element of the Federal judiciary, which daily renders invaluable services to this Nation's courts.

This amendment would help insure that there is not an immediate and drastic reduction in the number of senior Federal judges who now provide substantial and crucial services to the Federal courts of appeal and district courts. In so doing it attempts to insure the continued efficient operational of the Federal judiciary.

Federal judge who, having taken senior status, voluntarily agreed to perform any service for the courts. The provisions do so by characterizing as "wages" a senior-status judge's retirement salary, if he or she voluntarily chooses to render service to a court, thereby making that salary subject to FICA taxes. The irony is that if that same judge chooses not to work, his or her retirement salary is not subject to such taxes.

Federal judges who are appointed for life under article III of the Constitution are permitted by statue to retain their judicial offices, but retire from regular active service at the age of 65 or 70. The same statute provides that a retired judge shall continue to receive the salary of the office for life. It is clear that in so structuring this system of compensation for the Federal bench, Congress intended to encourage able Federal judges to retain the incidents of office after retirement, and to provide services as needed. Statistics maintained by the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, as well as testimony from active judges and administators, indicate that services rendered by senior-status judges sitting by assignment have enabled courts of appeal and the district courts to manage ever-increasing case loads, and allowed the reduction of the number of new judgeships requested of Congress by the Judicial Conference. Senior-status judges for instance, terminated 8.6 percent of the civil cases, and 5.5 percent of the criminal cases, before the lower Federal courts in the last court-management year.

The Nation and the Federal judiciary derives great value from senior judges. I believe fairness dictates that compensation received by retired Federal judges be treated as retirement income, the assumption on which those judges agreed to continue active service. I urge my colleagues to support this simple and cost-efficient measure which will go far toward insuring the continuing assistance of an important element of the Federal bench.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senator HATFIELD be added as a sponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2250) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2251

(Purpose: To correct a technical problem with the cash flow loan provisions of the unemployment insurance fund)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have a technical amendment I offer for the distinguished Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD). I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), on behalf of Mr. STAFFORD, proposes an amendment numbered 2251.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

CLARIFICATION WITH RESPECT TO REPAYMENT OF LOANS

SEC. . (a) Section 1202 (b)(2) of the Social Security Act is amended—

(1) in the matter preceding subparagraph (A), by striking out "advance" and inserting in lieu thereof "advances";

(2) in subparagraph (A), by striking out "advance is" and inserting in lieu thereof "advances are";

(3) in subparagraph (A), by striking out "advance was" and inserting in lieu thereof "advances were"; and

(4) in subparagraph (B), by striking out "advance" the second place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "advances".

(b) The amendments made by this section shall apply to advances made on or after April 1, 1982.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to correct a technical problem with the language of section 1202 of the Social Security Act. Section 1202 provides the authority for the unemployment insurance trust fund to grant cash flow loans to State UI funds and to allow such loans to be paid back to the trust fund before the end of the fiscal year without an interest charge. This was the intent of the Congress.

A technical problem has arisen in the choice of the word "advance" in the singular form because the Department of Treasury interprets this to mean only one advance can be given in a year's time. Thus, a State that might get an advance in January, pay it back in February, and then get another in March and pay that back before September 30 would be charged interest on both.

This is not the intent of the committee or the Congress when we adopted section 1202.

The technical amendment will change the word "advance" to the plural form "advances" where necessary in section 1202 to conform the section to congressional intent.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, this change may sound modest, just adding a little "s" to a word, but it will mean quite a different thing to some States.

Mr. DOLE. I am pleased that the Senator from Vermont has called this to our attention. I understand he has discussed it with the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2251) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, so our colleagues may be informed, as far as this Senator is aware there are still the following possible amendments: An amenment by Senator PERCY, an amendment by Senator BYRD on reach-back, an amendment by Senator SPECTER—I think that is an amendment on a matter we do not have jurisdiction over in our committee. I would hope we would not get into that one.

Senator LEVIN has an amendment and Senator QUAYLE has a possible amendment. Then Senators COHEN and LEVIN have an amendment on disability. I think we are prepared now to move to that amendment.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, will there be a vote on that amendment?

Mr. DOLE. There is a possibility.

AMENDMENT NO. 2227

(Purpose: To extend for 6 days the provision allowing payment of disability benefits during appeal)

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Maine (Mr. COHEN), for himself, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. BOREN, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. GLENN, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. FORD, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. PELL, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. DODD, Mr. SASSER, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. HATFIELD, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. WARNER and Mr. CHAFEE proposes an amendment numbered 2227.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

EXTENSION OF PROVISION ALLOWING PAYMENT OF DISABILITY BENEFITS DURING APPEAL

SEC. 9. Section 223(g)(3)(B) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "October 1, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "December 1, 1983".

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, this amendment is quite simple. It would extend for a period of 60 days, until December 1, a temporary law that allows social security disability recipients to continue to receive their benefits while their appeal is pending and a decision determining their eligibility will be continued during that period of time.

In addition to Senator LEVIN are the following cosponsors: Mr. HEINZ, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. BOREN, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. GLENN, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. FORD, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. PELL, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. DODD, Mr. SASSER, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. HATFIELD, and Mrs. HAWKINS.

Mr. President, what we are trying to do is to rectify a problem in our social security disability law which has been pending for some time. Senator LEVIN and I held hearings a year ago last May as a result of those hearings we discovered that a lot of innocent people were being harmed by a policy that was forcing them to go off the disability rolls without an adequate face-to-face determination of the nature of their disability, without any showing of medical improvement on the part of the Government, without uniform standards, without a definition of pain in the law, and putting them at considerable pain and expense for a period ranging anywher from 6 months to 18 months, only to have a great majority of those decisions reversed on appeal and then reinstated after they had to undergo tremendous mental and physical pain and anguish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. The Senator has a right to be heard. The Chair will ask those conducting conversations to retire to the cloakroom.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may add Senators THURMOND and D'AMATO as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COHEN. Originally, we proposed a comprehensive revision of the law that would have established a medical improvement test or a medical technology improvement test that would have been borne by the Social Security Administration, to insist upon a definition of pain being in the law, to insist that we have uniform standards, that we have a face-to-face interview at the initial stage and the determination for review process, that we make permanent the benefit continuation requirement, and that we make the Social Security Administration follow the Circuit Court of Appeals decisions.

Senator DOLE and others raised the question of whether or not we needed more time to review the implications of such a comprehensive approach to our disability laws.

I agreed with that.

We agreed to pass a temporary measure continuing benefits during that appeal stage so that innocent people would not be denied their benefits.

Senator DOLE wrote to me on August 2 of this year as follows:

> Because of the many matters being dealt with by the Finance Committee in July, it was not possible to schedule a hearing and begin the legislative process at that time. I am now in the process of scheduling hearings for September and disability legislation is a priority. I hope to schedule such a hearing early after the recess. That will give us the opportunity to study the House Social Security Subcommittee bill, which should be completed by then, and also give us time to complete action by October 1.

Mr. President, October 1 is almost here, and action has not been completed. I understand there have been delays. I know Senator DOLE is one who is truly concerned about the problems the handicapped and disabled in our society are confronted with. What I recommend is that we extend this period, this temporary legislation that we agreed to last spring, another 60 days. I point out that the House of Representatives has already acted this morning. They have extended it only 45 days because they believe the time has come to revise our social security disability laws consistent with the elements I mentioned before.

Mr. President, I hope there will be no great controversy that we continue the policy which has been put into effect on a temporary basis, but not make it so extensive that it becomes part of a permanent deferral of the problem. It seems to me where the House has already acted to extend it for 45 days, we can act to extend it 60 days. It means we have to go to conference, but we ought to insist upon a high priority being placed upon revision of this law.

It seems to me a year and a half of the current crisis and chaos that exists in our system—at least nine States have put holds on all review cases right now. One State has put a total review on any of the mental disability cases. We have a system where the Governors now are complaining about the chaotic system we have in the Federal establishments. I think 60 days is a reasonable timeframe to extend this. I hope it has the support of my colleagues.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Maine and I and 35 other Senators are offering this amendment for two reasons—to ease the hardship on our disabled workers while they are reviewed by the Social Security Administration (SSA) for their continued eligibility in the title II social security disability program, and to create an action-enforcing mechanism for Congress to pass comprehensive reform legislation this year, before we adjourn the 1st session of the 98th Congress.

Last year we passed and enacted into law a short-term provision, requiring the payment of benefits through appeal to an administrative law judge (ALJ), as a stop gap measure while we worked on comprehensive legislation to reform the disability program. At that time there was a commitment to get the comprehensive bill passed before the October 1, expiration date for the benefits payment provision. Well we have not been able to do that. The bill in the House, introduced by Congressman PICKLE, chairman of the Social Security Subcommittee, has just been reported by the House Ways and Means Committee. S. 476, the bill introduced by Senator COHEN and myself in the Senate, with 29 cosponsors, is presently under consideration in the Senate Finance Committee. In either case, these bills will not be passed by both Houses and presented to the President for signature before the October 1 deadline, this Saturday. We need another extension, but, we do not need a long one.

Congress must address the critical substantive issues contained in these comprehensive reform bills this year, before we adjourn, for several important reasons.

First, the protection of judicial review legislatively mandated for persons terminated from the disability program is in jeopardy. Numerous courts have held that SSA must show medical improvement before an individual beneficiary can be terminated from the program. The bills in both the House and the Senate would legislatively impose such a requirement. Yet, SSA has adopted a policy of nonacquiescence to these court decisions, which means that SSA will follow such decision only in the case in which it was decided, and will not use it as precedent for subsequent cases or claimants. This policy of nonacquiescence has been challenged successfully at the district court level in the 9th circuit and SSA has been ordered to reevaluate persons in the 9th circuit terminated without a showing of medical improvement. That case is on appeal. However, with SSA being forced to apply the standard of medical improvement in the 9th circuit, but through its policy of nonacquiescence refusing to apply that standard to persons in other circuits, we have a Federal program which will be run on an unequal basis. It is not fair to other disabled beneficiaries in the other circuits who, despite perhaps similar court decisions in circuits with no such court decisions will still have to litigate to get a medical improvement standard applied to their review decision.

Congress must promptly decide this issue. It is a substantive question for the disability program—not one of legislative interpretation, and we should address it immediately to eliminate the doubt and confusion that has resulted from these numerous court cases.

Second, several States presently defy the SSA directives on the implementation of the continuing disability reviews and apply their own standards to determine eligibility and to correct egregious problems. The situation is so bad that States are simply assuming control of the program. Some States are following the decisions of the courts on medical improvement. Others have imposed their own moratoriums until this program gets straightened out. This means that an individual's treatment again may depend upon the State in which he or she lives. That is not fair. It violates our notion of due process. This is a national program and should be administered the same way in all States. I ask unanimous consent that the article that appeared in the September 11, New York Times describing the actions that some States have taken be printed in the RECORD at this point.

We should not let this problem fester longer than absolutely necessary.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK AND OTHER STATES FLOUT U.S. RULES FOR DISABILITY BENEFITS

(By Robert Pear)

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11.—New York and other states, eager to help people retain Social Security disability benefits, have begun to flout Federal rules for the program, and so far the Reagan Administration has taken no action to penalize them.

States administer the program on a local level, but they are supposed to follow policies and eligibility criteria set by the Federal Government.

In a variety of legal and political actions over three months, the Governors of New York, North Carolina, Massachusetts, Arkansas, Kansas, West Virginia and other states have challenged the Reagan Administration's restrictive interpretation of the law. In some places state officials have cooperated with beneficiaries suing the Federal Government.

Last week Gov. James B. Hunt Jr. of North Carolina ordered a moratorium on the removal of people from the rolls, except in cases of fraud.

374,000 DROPPED FROM ROLLS

Nationwide, 374,000 people have been removed from the rolls since March 1981, Federal officials said. The program costs $18 billion a year and provides monthly cash benefits to 3.9 million people. A 1980 law requires the Social Security Administration to re-examine beneficiaries once every three years unless they are permanently disabled.

Social Security officials insist that a "crackdown" was needed to remove ineligible people from the rolls. But the officials now acknowledge that the process should have been more "humane" and that errors were made.

Two major reasons that Federal officials have not penalized the states are that doing so would be politically awkward for the Administration in light of its pledge to be more humane and that it would be difficult to suddenly disrupt the "partnership" that has existed between Federal and state agencies over the years in administering the program.

The action taken by Governor Hunt resembles a moratorium announced in July by Cesar A. Perales, the New York State Commissioner of Social Services, who asserted that the Federal Government was not meeting its "legal and moral obligations" to the disabled. Peter P. DiSturco, the Regional Commissioner of Social Security, then sent a letter to Mr. Perales saying New York was "not in compliance" with the Federal law. But he did not indicate what action, if any, the Federal Government might take.

New York State has also joined New York City in a lawsuit challenging Federal standards used to determine whether people with mental disabilities are eligible for benefits. The state and the city filed a second lawsuit last month charging the Federal Government had improperly denied disability benefits to thousands of people with severe heart disease.

Gov. Michael S. Dukakis of Massachusetts said his state was joining in another lawsuit against the Reagan Administration, was reopening cases in which disability benefits had been cut off and was insisting on proof of medical improvement before removing anyone else from the rolls. The Reagan Administration contends that, under the law, it can cut off benefits without having to show that a person's medical condition has improved.

The National Governors Association last month called for major changes in this and other Federal policies governing the disability program. Social Security officials said they were studying the state actions but had not imposed any penalties.

In June, Margaret M. Heckler, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, announced changes designed to end what she said were the "hardships and heartbreaks" that had occurred in the program. But state officials, considering those steps inadequate, have gone further.

Representative Edward R. Roybal, Democrat of California, chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, who has held several hearings on the program, said the state actions sent a clear message to the Federal Government that "the current policy is wrong and will no longer be supported by the nation's governors."

ORDER IN WEST VIRGINIA

States have a financial incentive to keep people on the rolls because the Federal Government pays all the costs of Social Security disability benefits. People who lose those benefits often turn up on state or local welfare rolls.

State officials also have political reasons for asserting more control over the program. Gov. Bill Clinton of Arkansas has said that state officials receive many complaints about the program but have "virtually no real power" to affect decisions on individual cases.

He said that when state employees tried to keep people on the rolls they were often overruled by Social Security officials. This, he said, was "counter to the Administration's own philosophy," which generally calls for Federal officials to respect the judgment of state officials running social welfare programs.

In West Virginia, Gov. John D. Rockefeller 4th ordered the state rehabilitation agency to follow "Federal court decisions most favorable to beneficiaries." He said this "would generally require a showing of medical improvement" before a person could be removed from the rolls.

Several Federal courts have ruled that the Federal Government must show such improvement, but Mrs. Heckler has announced she "does not acquiesce" in the decisions and has directed lower-level officials to disregard them. The legality of such a policy is now before the courts.

In July, Governor Clinton directed Arkansas officials to comply with Federal court decisions holding that severe pain by itslf could be a disabling condition. Mr. Clinton said Federal officials had "ignored" the decisions. The United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, which includes Arkansas, said that "for some unexplained reason" the Secretary of Health and Human Services "insists upon ignoring this court's statements with respect to the proper evaluation of pain."

Social Security officials said they would obey a court decision in the case of a specific individual but did not have to apply the court's interpretation of the law to other similar cases.

In Kansas, Gov. John Carlin said the disability program had "exceeded the bounds of acceptability" in denying benefits to the truly disabled. The state has decided to reexamine cases in which benefits were cut off in the last year and has said it will no longer follow unreasonably strict Federal guidelines.

The Governors of New Jersey and Connecticut have not announced any major challenge to the Federal rules. But a New Jesey state agency, the Department of the Public Advocate, is working with Legal Services of New Jersey, the federally financed program for the poor, in a lawsuit to assist people who face possible loss of benefits. They are trying to force the Federal Government to give greater weight to evidence of pain and to the medical opinion expressed by a claimant's regular physician.

In Washington, the House Ways and Means Committee is considering a bill that would alleviate many of the problems cited by the nation's governors. The bill would require the Government to comply with appellate court rulings and would make it more difficult to cut off benefits.

Social Security officials expressed concern about the bill, saying it could increase Federal spending by several billion dollars. The sponsor of the bill, Representative J. J. Pickle, Democrat of Texas, is also concerned about program costs, but he said the Administration had been too "hasty and harsh" in its efforts to prune the disability rolls.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, third, last year, when we passed the provision requiring the continuation of the payment of benefits through the ALJ, we also passed a requirement that SSA implement a face to face evidentiary hearing at the reconsideration level by January 1, 1984. Both the Pickle bill and our bill, S. 476, reverses that legislative mandate and replaces it with a personal interview at the initial determination level by State officials. SSA has been and continues to gear up for the earlier requirement. Given the momentum in Congress to change that earlier requirement, it will waste a significant amount of staff time and money to let that process continue when we know that there is great likelihood that it might be changed.

Fourth, although the payment of benefits eases the pain of the ordeal of these continuing disability reviews and covers individuals until the hearing by ALJ's we have found that under the current system the ALJ may no longer be a guarantee of an impartial hearing. Our Subcommittee on Oversight of Government Management recently issued a report finding that SSA is exerting pressure on ALJ's to reduce their allowance rates. In fact, the allowance rate of ALJ's has declined dramatically in the past 2 years, from 67.2 percent to 51.9 percent. The strict standards imposed by SSA on the State offices is being imposed by SSA on its ALJ's and as a result the decisions of the ALJ's are changing. Comprehensive legislation addresses the legitimacy of these standards and would make them subject to public notice and comment.

Last, Mr. President, the horror stories have not gone away. The human impact of these continuing disability reviews is as serious as ever. I refer my colleagues to a recent article in a Michigan paper, the Detroit Free Press, dated September 8, 1983. I quote from that article and ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed in the RECORD at this point. The article states in part:

Many who were left in this financial limbo, such as Joe Taylor, a former worker at General Motor's AC Division in Flint, who retired on disability after injuring his back twice on the job, feel real desperation.

A review by the state Department of Social Services last year concluded that Taylor was fit to do some type of semi-skilled work, although after two spinal laminectomies he cannot sit or stand for more that 10 minutes at a time without intense pain or lie in bed more than two or three hours a night. A CAT scan and four myelograms have given doctors evidence that Taylor will never improve.

The 56-year-old Davison man appealed for a state review and was denied again. He had a hearing before an administrative law judge in Flint and was again denied, although the Social Security Administration's own doctor testified that Taylor was disabled and the disability appeared permanent.

Taylor's case is now before the SSA's Appeals Council in Washington. If he loses again, his only recourse will be to take his case to federal court.

"I have my house up for sale because I can't afford to pay for it any more," Taylor said, "I can't drive. I can't even help my wife mow the lawn. I'm down to the last $3,000 in savings and I just don't know where to turn."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DISABLED—BUT CAST OFF PENSION ROLLS

(By Jean Heller)

The Madison Heights soldier came home from Vietnam in 1967 after a bullet penetrated his brain. Over the years, he developed seizures, neurotic and paranoid behavior, hearing and memory loss and severely diminished vision. A board-certified Detroit neurologist diagnosed him as totally disabled.

But in January 1982, just a month after the veteran had been hospitalized for treatment of his problems, the Social Security Administration notified him that they would cut off his benefits. After a review of Social Security benefits ordered by Congess, authorities deemed the veteran fit to return to work.

A young Union Lake woman, Mary Rubenacker, now 20 years old, began trying in May 1981 to collect disability benefits under her father's Social Security. She has a severely limited capacity to learn and has to lean against walls to walk. She also has poor vision and very limited dexterity.

A vocational counselor who worked with her for four years diagnosed her co-ordination as that of a kindergartner, and said she would need an advocate or guardian for the rest of her life.

Twice she was denied disabiltiy benefits on the grounds she could do some work. Finally in July, an administrative law judge reversed the decision and wrote in his opinion, "It is extraordinary that the claimant could have been denied benefits . . . It is ludicrous to imagine her attempting to function in the workplace."

Richard Kage of Reed City, Mich., had been a diabetic since age 12, suffered a stroke and hemorrhages that left him blind in his left eye and virtually sightless in his right. A Social Security medical examination concluded that some minor tunnel vision in his right eye "gives him some reprieve from being a total cripple."

On that basis, Kage's benefits were ended in July 1981, and pending an appeal that would take months, Kage found a job as a caretaker in a cemetery.

In November 1981, days before Kage was scheduled for a second medical examination he suffered a heart attack and died.

These cases, and hundreds of thousands of others across the country, are the result of a massive sweep of the Social Security disability pension rolls begun by the Carter administration and accelerated by the Reagan administration.

The huge increase in pension reviews began after Congress passed the Disability Insurance Amendments of 1980 requiring that recipients have their physical conditions and benefits reviewed every three years, with the process beginning in 1982. Budget Director David Stockman accelerated that process, ordering the reviews to begin in 1981. Some recipients were later exempted from the reviews.

The review process is an attempt to clear at least 700,000 people—ostensibly those who have regained, or never lost, the ability to work—from the more than 4.3 million Americans on the pension rolls at any one time.

So far, 22,217, or 44 percent, of the 50,498 Social Security recipients in Michigan undergoing reviews have had their benefits terminated. Another 28,281 Michigan recipients were authorized to continue receiving benefits after their reviews.

The reviews are posing major problems for both Michigan residents and the state budget.

The State Inter-Agency Task Force on Disability issued a report earlier this summer which estimated that about 2.5 percent of Michigan's population, or more than 230,000 people, receive Social Security disability pensions, totaling just over $1 billion a year.

The report projected that about 40 percent of Michigan's disabled would lose their benefits by 1984 and that 30 percent of those terminated would wind up dependent on state welfare programs or in state institutions.

"Should these estimates prove to be accurate, Michigan will eventually be called upon to replace $123 million in benefit payments which should rightfully be paid from federal moneys," the report concluded.

Even critics of the disability reviews concede there were, and still are, people receiving disability pensions who shouldn't be. But those critics also contend that the magnitude and intent of the review result in woefully inadequate counseling services and arbitrary, callous decisions that deny benefits to many who deserve them.

Several members of Congress, including Democratic Sens. Don Riegle and Carl Levin of Michigan, have called the disability reviews an exercise in bureaucratic cruelty that heaps hardship on those already heavily burdened.

But Social Security Administration officials insist they have no choice; that both the review process and the nature of what qualifies as a disability are mandated by law.

In an interview, Paul Simmons, deputy director of the Social Security Administration, said: "The Social Security Act provides that a claimant's impairments must be so severe that he is not only unable to do his previous work, but cannot—taking into considerable his age, education and work experience—engage in any other kind of substantial gainful work which exists in the national economy.

"So long as this work exists in the national economy, it does not matter whether such work exists in the immediate area in which he lives, or whether a specific job vacancy exists for him, or whether he would be hired if he applied for the work. This is statutory language, not the SSA's interpretation."

Gerald Benjamin, a Detroit lawyer whose case load is made up almost entirely of the disabled who have been cast off the federal pension rolls, sees the entire review process as "a major, major scandal in the United States."

"The yardstick used to define what constitutes a disability is so narrow," he said, "that a person doesn't qualify unless he's in an accident involving a 1967 Ford pickup truck on the southeast corner of Eight Mile Road at high noon on Tuesday accompanied by both parents celebrating their golden wedding anniversary.

"And the work they claim the people can do is pure fiction. The SSA vocational statistics go back to 1968. They claim there are hundreds of thousands of jobs out there fitting widgets together, and maybe there were in 1968. But now all those jobs are in Korea and Taiwan and Japan, but nobody at Social Security knows that."

Alarmed by the potential fiscal burden, the National Governors Association earlier this month unanimously passed a resolution calling on Congress to pass remedial legislation to correct the abuses in how the disability program is administered.

The association is concerned about estimates, such as one by William Copeland, a Washington consultant on disability insurance, that by next year, the cost to the states of covering terminated disability benefits will be $1.6 billion nationwide, with large annual increases thereafter.

Although the congressional uproar and public outcry has since prompted the Department of Health and Human Services to exempt about one million beneficiaries from reviews, state agencies that act as the SSA's case agents were swamped by the enormous new workload.

The results have been staggering.

Early in the program, inundated state examiners made so many misjudgments about who qualified for benefits that, on appeal, more than 75 percent of the decisions to deny benefits were overturned. That reversal rate has dropped in the past year, but still is well above 50 percent.

Meanwhile, in the months, even years, it takes to complete appeals, thousands of claimants have lost their homes, their families, even their lives.

Many who were left in this financial limbo, such as Joe Taylor, a former worker at General Motors' AC Division in Flint, who retired on disability after injuring his back twice on the job, feel real desperation.

A review by the state Department of Social Services last year concluded that Taylor was fit to do some type of semi-skilled work, although after two spinal laminectomies he cannot sit or stand for more than 10 minutes at a time without intense pain or lie in bed more than two or three hours a night. A CAT scan and four myelograms have given doctors evidence that Taylor will never improve.

The 56-year-old Davison man appealed for a state review and was denied again. He had a hearing before an administrative law judge in Flint and was again denied, although the Social Security Administration's own doctor testified that Taylor was disabled and the disability appeared permanent.

Taylor's case is now before the SSA's Appeals Council in Washington. If he loses again, his only recourse will be to take his case to federal court.

"I have my house up for sale because I can't afford to pay for it any more," Taylor said. "I can't drive. I can't even help my wife mow the lawn. I'm down to the last $3,000 in savings and I just don't know where to turn."

Taylor's problem is similar to those of other disability claimants with back injuries, according to Detroit attorney Benjamin.

"A lot of people who have cervical or lumbar laminectomies aren't better afterwards," he said. "But the law assumes surgery cures all back problems. It's very difficult for a person to prove he's not better. His level of pain can't be measured."

According to Benjamin and several other attorneys who specialize in disability cases, the medical criteria for evaluating claimants often are based on accepted practice and diagnosis of the 1950s and 1960s and actually require that case reviewers disregard more modern, accurate techniques.

"A person applying for disability with a respiratory problem only meets the Social Security criteria as last rites are being administered," Benjamin said. "The pulmonary function criteria require a degree of impairment that not only precludes work, it precludes survival.

"The criteria in cardiology give more weight to a stress test than to a heart catheterization which is a far better diagnostic tool. But the catheterization procedure didn't exist when the Social Security regulations were written, so it simply isn't recognized. Some heart patients are so sick it could constitute medical malpractice to put them on a treadmill. But SSA says you've got to do it."

Another inequity comes at the third level of the review process, during the hearing before an administrative law judge. A person's Zip Code can determine whether he or she is disabled; some declared eligible for a pension in Detroit would be denied in Oakland County.

There are five offices in Michigan hearing the reviews, and the rate at which judges in those offices reverse benefit denials varies considerably.

In fiscal year 1982, Detroit judges heard 3,254 cases of denied benefits and reversed 56.3 percent of them. Judges in the Southfield office heard 3,554 cases and reversed 40.6 percent.

Flint judges heard 1,531 cases and reversed 53.8 percent. Lansing heard 2,757 cases and reversed 70 percent. And, in Grand Rapids, judges heard 927 cases and reversed 59 percent.

Around the state, rates of reversal vary from barely over 20 percent to nearly 90 percent.

An anomaly in the review procedure is that during the five stages of review and appeal, the criteria for determining disability broaden, so an individual denied at the initial agency level may find a judge later in the appeals process who will be broader in interpreting what constitutes a disability and will grant benefits.

But under current law, three years after the initial state agency review, a claimant must be reviewed again by the same state agency that denied benefits originally, and under the same criteria by which he or she failed to qualify in the first place. Any intervening decision by an administrative law judge or federal judge to grant benefits may carry no weight at all.

Nor does a decision by an administrative law judge or a federal court to grant benefits in one case create a precedent for other cases, no matter how similar.

"Social Security is the only area of law where legal precedent isn't recognized," said Benjamin.

As a result, the appeals process is clogged with people whose cases might otherwise have been disposed of quickly. In areas of heavy disability claims, like Michigan, judges have had to hire magistrates to help with their case loads and magistrates have had to hire assistants.

As a result, "Social Security disability has become a major growth industry," Benjamin said.

The unending progression of review and appeal has created such a huge new bureaucracy that consultant Copeland believes there will be no $11 billion savings to the federal government, as the program projected, and there could actually be a net loss of as much as $400 million, when costs for appeals and other procedures are included.

There also is some evidence that the sweep of the disability rolls wasn't even necessary from a fiscal standpoint.

According to Lowell Arye of the House Select Committee on Aging, the disabilty trust fund was the only one of the three Social Security trust funds (the others are old age pension and Medicare) that has been solvent, and it was expected to remain so well into the 21st Century.

In 1981, the Social Security trustees projected that in 1985, the disability fund would be running at a $14.9 billion annual surplus.

Mr. LEVIN. The horror stories are still out there. The program remains a national disgrace.

Mr. President, in all good conscience, we must not extend the serious problems of which we are all aware in this program beyond the term of this session. We have the momentum now to get comprehensive legislation passed. This 60-day extension commits us to do just that—to take action to substantively and permanently revise the procedures currently used in the disability program.

I know the chairman of the Finance Committee shares my concern over this program. He has expressed his support for comprehensive reform legislation in the recent past, and I know these bills could not be in more capable hands.

I thank Senator COHEN for his continuing good leadership on this issue and I thank the cosponsors of this amendment for their support. I urge its adoption.

As the Chair and others will remember, we have a temporary program in effect now, a program which allows for payments to be made during appeal. This is a temporary program pending a comprehensive reform of our system. That reform is desperately necessary. We cannot continue to hold off that reform, given the circumstances in our States, where we have some States simply flouting the Social Security Administration, ignoring national standards and going their own way. We have a system where we have courts that are ruling that the Social Security Administration—Mr. President, we have a situation in this country that really borders on lawlessness. Right now, in the social security disability arena, we have some courts which have ordered the SSS to apply the law in a certain way. The SSS is refusing to do that in cases other than the case at hand. In other words, we have some people getting one style of justice and other people getting a different type of justice depending on what State they are in or what circuit they are in.

We have a situation now which is so bad in the social security disability arena that we have, believe it or not, States that are actually flouting the national standards of the Social Security Administration, saying they are going their own way, they are applying their own standards, they are going to ignore the Social Security Administration standards because they are so irrelevant and, in some cases, so unjust.

We are all working on a comprehensive reform. the Senator from Kansas is committed to it. The Senator from Louisiana is committed to it. The only question is how long can we cope with the present system? Is it fair to all of our people to put over comprehensive reform until next year? Or should we prod ourselves, should we give ourselves an action-enforcing mechanism and say to ourselves, let us do this in 60 days?

We are a country of laws. We want people all to be bound by the same law, by the same rule. We now have a situation in this country where people in one circuit are getting one kind of relief, in another circuit, they are getting another kind of relief. In one State, they are getting relief; in another State, they are not. It is all because Congress has not yet acted. It is that simple. I think our hearts are all in the right place, by the way. I do not think we have any doubt, I think that we all agree we must reform this system. We cannot tolerate this patchwork, crazy-quilt system we have in disability. The only question is what is tolerable?

Is it tolerable to say wait until next year, which is what all of us say after our favorite baseball teams lose their respective races? Is it tolerable in the social security disability arena to say wait until next year? Or has the time come when we must say let us do it this session?

My good friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, hoped we could do it by October 1. I know he has tried, I give him credit for that effort. I know my friend from Louisiana has said we must reform the system and he has tried.

I would say 60 days is plenty long. The House decided 45 days is plenty long. Let us not take ourselves off the hook until some undetermined time next year while we have people who are truly disabled who are on the hook in all of our States.

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senators LEVIN, COHEN, and others in offering an amendment to extend for 60 days the soon-to-expire law that provides for the continuation of benefits for social security disability beneficiaries who are appealing a decision to terminate their benefits.

As we all know, the continuing disability investigations in the social security disability insurance (SSDI) program have been a matter of extreme controversy ever since the Reagan administration started reviewing SSDI beneficiaries several months prior to time mandated by Congress. The concern has always centered around whether the large number of individuals who are being terminated from the disability rolls are actually not eligible for benefits under law. Since these reviews started in 1981, over 90,000 disabled individuals have had their SSDI benefits reinstated by an administrative law judge (ALJ). In essence, these ALJ's have found that over 90,000 incorrect decisions where made by the State disability examiners in reevaluating continuing eligibility of SSDI beneficiaries. This is a serious problem and one that clearly needs congressional attention. I am pleased that the House has recognized this problem and has crafted a comprehensive legislative proposal designed to correct the wrongful termination of SSDI beneficiaries from the disability rolls.

Mr. President, the proposal, which we are offering today, to provide for a 60-day extension of benefits through the appeals process is needed until both Houses of Congress can act on comprehensive legislation. I strongly urge all of my colleagues to join us in supporting this amendment.●

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, unless we act now to extend social security disability benefits, thousands of beneficiaries and their families will be confronted with financial chaos and personal tragedy. The amendment we are considering is imperative if we are to reduce the suffering that many beneficiaries have been forced to endure because of the loss of benefits. This amendment would extend social security disability benefits for an additional 60 days, through the administrative law judge appeals level. This measure is entirely consistent with action taken previously by this Congress.

I believe the 60-day extension only sets the stage for comprehensive reform. It is my sincere hope that the Senate Finance Committee will act quickly to mark up disability reform legislation and we will not be required to repeat these stop-gap measures.

The need for change within the disability review process cannot be underestimated. A number of us have been working for months and months to resolve this very troubling situation. While more comprehensive changes are needed in the appeals process, this amendment will temporarily protect innocent disability recipients.

The disability review process, mandated by Congress in 1980, has become a major concern for 80,000 Minnesotans who are severely disabled. There is nothing intrinsically wrong with reviews every 3 years. We cannot, and should not, continue payments ot persons who are no longer disabled. While our original intent should remain unchanged, we must change the process by which we carry out this intent.

We must take great care to insure that those who are truly qualified are not terminated from the disability rolls. By continuing payments through the administrative law judge level, we can alleviate the financial affliction that many have suffered.

I urge my colleagues, however, to work for comprehensive disability reform and long-term answers to these serious problems. I am hopeful that the Senate will successfully enact this amendment, as an interim measure, and benefits will be extended for 60 days.●

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have just been visiting with the distinguished majority leader. He would like to stay not much beyond quarter to 7. There ought to be some way to resolve this problem. This amendment contains a 60-day extension. I would prefer a 6-month extension. Senator SASSER has a 90-day bill. The House bill has 45 days. Others might prefer a longer time. I do not see why we need a rollcall on whether or not to extend this important provision by 60 days, 120 days, or 180. If we could agree on a 90-day extension, I believe that would be reasonable. We need time to develop a consensus approach to more comprehensive disability legislation.

If we are going to do justice to the disability insurance program and the amendments enacted in 1980, then we are going to have to have some extensive hearings on the House-passed bill. Representative PICKLE has been working on a bill for months. It has just been approved by the Ways and Means Committee, but has not yet gone to the floor. Mr. PICKLE held extensive hearings, heard many witnesses, and did a lot of work. Let us face it, though, the Ways and Means Committee approved a very expensive bill.

It seems to me that changes are possible without destroying what I think is a good effort to review and monitor the disability rolls. I want to be part of the solution, not part of the problem. I hope we might reach some agreement on the extension.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I would have no objection to modifying the amendment to reflect a 90-day period, if that would meet with the agreement of the chairman.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I also thank the chairman and we have not yet heard from our friend from Louisiana. Assuming that is agreeable with them, I certainly concur with so modifying the amendment. I am confident our cosponsors also would concur in it. At least I believe they would.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment now pending is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

EXTENSION OF PROVISION ALLOWING PAYMENT OF DISABILITY BENEFITS DURING APPEAL

SEC. 9. Section 223(g)(3)(B) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "October 1, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "January 1, 1983".

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am pleased to support this amendment, which would extend for 60 days the temporary provision we passed late last year, allowing disabled social security beneficiaries the option of having their benefits continued pending their appeal before an administrative law judge.

The merits of the provision itself have been well documented. In fact, over the course of the continuing disability reviews that began in the spring of 1981, roughly two-thirds of those disability beneficiaries who appeal their terminations before the administrative law judges have been reinstated. But the reinstatement became effective only after a long period of time—frequently from 9 months to 1 year after the erroneous termination. Indeed the merits of this provision have been so well established that S. 476, which I have cosponsored, would make it a permanent provision.

I am, however, advocating only a short-term extension at this point because I believe it is time that we in the Congress squarely face our responsibility to correct the obvious problems that have resulted from the heavy-handed administration of the disability legislation we passed in 1980.

We have witnessed these problems for more than 2 years. Last year we passed a short-term bill, because we said that the Senate's schedule did not permit consideration of a long-term, comprehensive reform bill. We agreed in the floor debate that comprehensive legislation would be passed by the Congress by the expiration of the temporary provision on October 1, 1983. Today, however, we are here again, on the eve of that target date, telling the American people that Congress does not have the time to pass comprehensive legislation before October 1—so we have to extend this provision to give Congress time to act.

Well, I say to my colleagues—Let us make the time to deal with this issue. Let us stop slipping past deadlines. Let us stop resorting to temporary bandaids and face the real issue.

The preferred course of action, in my judgment, is to pass this short-term extension so that no social security beneficiaries suffer in the interim. But then let us sit down immediately after we pass this amendment and start marking up a comprehensive disability bill in October. And, before Thanksgiving, let the Senate vote on a comprehensive measure. There are really only two comprehensive legislative proposals being considered by the Congress: S. 476 by Senators COHEN and LEVIN, and H.R. 3755, the Pickle bill. Let us get to work on these reforms and bring a bill to the Senate floor, this year, before more damage is done to those most vulnerable members of our society.

It is time we face the issue and put it to rest, once and for all.

Let me simply review the key issues in this debate.

Why is it important not to delay comprehensive disability reform?

The first answer is that large numbers of beneficiaries are going through a process that results in the termination of their benefits, only to be reversed by an administrative law judge. Even with continuation of benefits pending appeal, disabled Americans are being put through the mill, needlessly and unjustifiably, at great expense to the taxpayers and to the trust funds. For example, even with continuation of benefits pending appeal, because SSA has not adopted a medical improvement standard, some 22,000 disabled workers will be terminated in fiscal year 1984, who would not be terminated at all if S. 476 or the Pickle bill, H.R. 3755, were enacted. Moreover, even though they can continue their benefits pending appeal, there are documented cases where individuals have committed suicide as a result of the stress. For example, last August in Eugene, Oreg., a social security beneficiary who suffered from a mental disability put a 22-calibre automatic pistol to his head and killed himself. This man, because he was not psychotic, was not protected by Mr. HECKLER's two-third moratorium on mental disabilities; and even though he could have his benefits continued pending appeal, the stress was just too much for him. All beneficiaries who are terminated live through a terrifying period awaiting their appeal; and the continuation of benefits is a help, but it is really not the answer. The answer is to stop terminating people who end up being put back on by the same Social Security Administration that kicked them off.

Second, because Congess has failed to act, there are now six circuit courts of appeal that have ruled that SSA has to show medical improvement or a clear error in the original award before terminating benefits. But the administration refuses to abide by these court decisions. And beneficiaries rightly ask why they continue being put through the process and terminated illegally.

Third and fourth, because of Congress failure to pass comprehensive legislation, there is no longer a single, Federal disability program; there is chaos. State imposed moratoriums are in effect in New York, Alabama, North Carolina, and Virginia.

The Western States in the ninth circuit are under a moratorium as a result of an important court decision, Lopez v. Heckler. And Secretary Heckler has imposed a partial, nationwide moratorium on reviews of people with mental disabilities who comprise 11 percent of disabled workers. As a result of a court decision in Minnesota, beneficiaries in five Midwestern States, who had mental disabilities, are having their cases re-reviewed. The States of Kansas, Arkansas, and West Virginia have begun re-reviewing people terminated during the last 2 years.

Mr. President, there is something wrong when you have a program as strictly defined as social security disability, and nearly half of the people who met that definition are told that they can go back to work. There is something wrong when about two-thirds of those who appeal their decisions are put back on by the administrative law judges. There is something wrong when the GAO pulls a sample of termination cases and finds that two-thirds of those terminated were put back on the rolls by the same Social Security Administration that took them off.

And because Congress has failed to face up to what is wrong in a thorough, comprehensive way, there is chaos in the administration of this program, and people are being treated very unfairly, very unevenly. And the American public has cause to wonder why Congress cannot find the time to deal with the problem, except by default.

Mr. President, I support the amendment. I commend Senator COHEN for offering it. I hoped we could reach this accommodation.

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Maine and the other cosponsors. As my colleagues know, one of the most important changes passed by the Congress in the lameduck session of 1982 allowed individuals who were terminated from the social security disability program to continue to receive benefits through the administrative law judge level of appeal. I supported that bill, H.R. 7093. It was clear that Congress and the President had to alleviate the trauma suffered by many of the disabled when they temporarily lost their benefits pending appeal.

But this change was only temporary. The benefit extension expires at the end of this month for newly terminated cases. The amendment offered by the Senator from Maine extends the deadline for 3 months, so that Congress may continue to work toward comprehensive reform in the social security disability program.

In addition to giving Congress sufficient time to work on longer range measures, the amendment accomplishes two major goals. First, it alleviates any confusion that may exist in the minds of social security disability recipients about what benefits are provided under the law. Many recipients who now receive benefits while they appeal mistakenly believe that their October check will be their last. In fact, they will continue to receive benefits until their appeal is decided by an administrative law judge. This amendment entitles beneficiaries removed from the rolls from October 1, 1983, through January 1, 1984, to continue to receive benefits while they appeal their loss of disability benefits.

Second, it continues a benefit that many of the disabled who are later reinstated to the program could not live without. I doubt that many healthy Americans would be able to survive financially if their sole source of income vanished for periods of 4, 6, or even 8 months. Yet, that is what happened before Congress passed H.R. 7093, and that is what will happen if we do not pass this amendment.

Let us be clear that this amendment, by itself, does not solve all of the problems in the social security disability program. Despite congressional efforts last year on H.R. 7093, and the changes made by the administration this summer, there are still gaps in the protection that social security provides to some of our most vulnerable citizens, the disabled.

In the 3-month grace period that this amendment provides, we must redouble our efforts to close this gap. At the same time, we must be mindful of the delicate financial balance in the social security trust funds. Any solution to these problems must not threaten the long-range solvency of the social security program.●

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, as a result of the implementation of the Social Security Disability Amendments of 1980, which required triannual reviews of nonpermanently disabled beneficiaries, reviews which the administration began in March 1981, over 400,000 individuals have been removed from the disability rolls. Far too many of these terminated individuals have been found to be truly deserving of benefits after appeal for anyone to consider such wrongful termiantions as isolated incidents in an otherwise smooth running system. And for all of those who have been wrongfully removed from the rolls, there are many more friends, relatives, and dependents who have been affected by the physical, emotional, and financial hardship of benefit terminations.

Last year the problem of wrongful terminations reached crisis proportions, and every Member of Congress was literally deluged with constitutent cases. Some of these individuals were so discouraged and hopeless at the termination of benefits—which provided their only means of support—that they committed suicide. In response to overwhelming concern, many Members urged that the Congress turn its full attention to consideration of comprehensive disability reform. Unfortunately, we were unable in the closing days of last year to address the issue fully. Instead, we were successful in enacting legislation which provided for benefits through the ALJ level, to provide to individuals who appealed their cases.

This extension of benefits was allowed through October 1 of this year, in hopes that comprehensive action would take place during the first 9 months of this year. It is obvious, and most unfortunate, that the Congress has not yet been able to achieve that goal, although we do expect a comprehensive bill to be acted upon by the House of Representatives in the very near future.

During Finance Committee discussion of the Federal supplemental compensation program there was discussion of extending these benefits for a time period, although no final extension date was agreed upon.

I would like to urge my colleagues to support a brief extension of these benefits. I believe that it is imperative that we extend these benefits and thereby provide the bare minimum of insurance against wrongful terminations to the hundreds of thousands of individuals currently on the disability rolls. However, I would like to stress that the time is now long past due for the Congress and the administration to turn their attention to comprehensive reform. I am hopeful that today we will approve an extension, with an understanding that we will see more comprehensive action before the close of 1983.

At this point, I would like to put the Senate on notice that if there is not progress soon toward comprehensive reform, I may at some time in the future offer an amendment on an appropriate bill which would address the problems in the disability program. This reform is too important to postpone. I would hope that it is a priority on everyone's agenda. It is certainly a priority on my agenda and I will work toward early Senate action.●

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today I join my colleagues in the Senate as cosponsor of this important amendment to extend for 60 days the temporary legislation which assures disabled individuals under the SSDI program of their benefits while they are appealing a Social Security Administration decision to terminate these benefits. Failure to extend disability benefits pending final determination would cause needless and unfair suffering for over 90,000 beneficiaries whose termination is inherently found to be erroneous by administrative law judges. Mr. President, it is simple justice that no disabled person should be cut off from his meager benefits and left without means of support until a final determination is made of his eligibility for those benefits.

The temporary law we wish to extend was enacted in the closing days of the 97th Congress in order to protect over 340,000 disabled people across the Nation who have been denied their social security disability benefits because of abusive and unfair procedures implemented by the Reagan administration. Today, we are called on to extend this critical provision because Congress has failed to fully address the grave situation which exists in the social security disability program, particularly the continuing disability insurance review process.

The administration's continuing disability reviews under SSDI have resulted in the needless suffering of hundreds of thousands of disabled citizens.

Since 1981, the Social Security Administration has been using insensitive and stricter guidelines to determine disability than legislated by Congress in 1980. The 1980 amendments required the SSA to institute a disability review process. But no one anticipated that this would result in the kind of abuses that the administration has fostered through its use of severely restrictive review guidelines, its speed-up of these reviews, and the encouragement of reviewers to terminate so capriciously that over 70 percent of all denials have been reversed by the administrative law judges.

In my home State of Massachusetts, disabled citizens testified to these injustices before a special Commission on Social Security Disability. One woman testified that her benefits were terminated despite 12 recent operations on her stomach, hand, neck, and back. Another young man born with cerebral palsy testified that he was examined by a contracted physician who totally ignored this medical history. Another person who had an artificial leg and an abscessed lung lost his benefits while he was in the hospital.

People who are mentally impaired—the most vulnerable group of all, have suffered the most. In some States, up to 50 percent of the mentally ill have had their benefits terminated—many left without the means to obtain shelter and food and forced to return to hospitals and institutions. Even Health and Human Services Secretary Margaret Heckler referred to this review system as "an awkward, bureaucratic, insensitive, paper-oriented process".

We have a commitment to all Americans who are disabled and we must alleviate the needless suffering of those individuals who have been unfairly denied benefits or who have suffered needless mental anguish as a result of fear of loss of benefits.

I urge my colleagues to adopt this amendment and to support swift and equitable action on comprehensive legislation to reform this system.

I commend my fellow cosponsors for their bipartisan efforts to deal with this critical problem, and I urge the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator DOLE, to address comprehensive legislation in this regard before December.●

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to voice my support for the amendment offered by the Senators from Maine and Michigan, Mr. COHEN and Mr. LEVIN.

The amendment addresses an issue which is vitally important to any discussion of the social security disability insurance program and is the centerpiece around which all reforms, either permanent of temporary must revolve. I am referring to the provision in the disability program passed by this Congress last year, and signed by the President in January, which allows for the continuation of benefit payments through the administrative law judge level of appeal.

The gross inequities and injustices resulting from the hasty acceleration of continuing disability investigations (CDI's) in March 1981 has been well documented and requires no further elaboration here. Suffice it to say that the overwhelming and broad support afforded the temporary disability legislation passed by Congress last year is clear testimony of the crucial need for changes in the DI program.

But the nature of that legislation was strictly temporary. For those of us who have been intimately concerned with this issue over the past 2 years, and I would like to especially compliment Senators COHEN and LEVIN for their outstanding efforts in this area. There is a clear and resounding realization that permanent reforms in the disability program are desperately needed. When H.R. 7093 passed Congress in the waning hours of the lame-duck session last December, it was generally acknowledged by those of us who had worked hard to secure its passage that comprehensive disability reforms would be forthcoming this year.

I am sorry to report that the progress of this comprehensive legislation has been disappointingly slow. In fact, H.R. 7093 contained a stipulation that continuation of benefits through the ALJ level of appeal would expire on October 1, 1983. Since it is highly doubtful that comprehensive legislation will make its way through Congress by Saturday, it is necessary to seek an extension of this important provision.

The extension would effectively accomplish the following objectives: First, it would alleviate any unnecessary confusion in the minds of disability recipients as to the extent of protection afforded them under disability law; and second, it would further serve to strengthen and clarify Congress intention to make this provision a permanent part of the disability process.

It should be noted here that the House has moved a comprehensive disability bill (H.R. 3755) through the Ways and Means Committee and is scheduled to take it up on the floor within the next few weeks. Consequently, they have included in their version of the Federal supplemental compensation bill a 45-day extension of benefits through the appeals process.

It is quite evident, then, that the House expects a quick and speedy resolution to the problems in the administration of the disability program. Why should the Senate expect anything less?

Now, Mr. President, I really do not think that we should get tangled up in an extensive debate over the length of time of such an extension. However, I do believe that it is within the scope of our responsibility to report out a comprehensive disability bill before the end of this year. It was for this reason that I offered S. 1843 some 2 weeks ago which called for a simple 3-month extension. A 3-month extension would give us time to look at the issue and report out a comprehensive bill before the end of the year. I personally have grave reservations about extending the provision by 6 months because it significantly relieves the pressure to act this year. Too often we delay till tomorrow what could be accomplished today. Thus, I would hope that we could settle on an extension of less than half a year, and whether it be 60 or 90 days, the concept of providing the extension itself is truly the important consideration.

I would also hope that whatever extension we agree on would not be necessary and that the Finance Committee would act quickly to resolve the problems facing the disability system. H.R. 3755 is a good starting point and I would hope that the Senate would have an opportunity to express itself on this legislation before we adjourn sine die for this year.

Mr. HELMS. I say to the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) that I have been extremely concerned over the plight of disabled Americans and I want to make sure I understand exactly what this amendment will do for these good people.

Mr. DOLE. This amendment will extend the time period in which a disabled individual can opt to receive benefits pending an appeal from a disability cutoff.

Mr. HELMS. Well, how long will this extention last?

Mr. DOLE. The extention is proposed to last 90 days.

Mr. HELMS. As I am sure the Senator is aware, I have introduced legislation which would go to the heart of the social security disability review problem. I am dedicated to seeing something is done to correct the problems with arbitrary cutoffs of disability payments to so many deserving Americans as soon as possible.

Mr. DOLE. I completely agree with the Senator. I too, am working toward that goal and am pleased that the Senator has taken the lead to introduce legislation of this nature.

Mr. HELMS. I assume the Senator also knows that Representative PICKLE's bill regarding this matter was marked up in the House Ways and Means Committee this week. The Pickle bill contains the same provisions as my legislation however, the Pickle bill increases the cost to the social security system, which my bill does not do. Because of this fact I feel strongly that my legislation, Senate Bill No. 1888 should be considered as a viable way to rectify the problems now existing with disability reviews.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator's bill, I believe, is now in the Senate Finance Committee where we will be giving it full consideration. However this amendment is needed to allow us time to carefully look at measures to solve the problems disability recipients are now facing.

Mr. HELMS. I am glad to know the Senator is also concerned about these individuals. I do not want a single deserving disabled American to be cut off from benefits unjustifiably. If this amendment temporarily insures that these individuals have their benefits continued until they are given due process of law through a hearing, I am in favor of it. I am also glad to hear that a permanent solution will be addressed by your committee in the near future. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOLE. Is that 90 days satisfactory to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SASSER. It certainly is satisfactory to this Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, as modified.

The amendment (No. 2227) as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HELMS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as I said, I think we could lay down the other Levin amendment. Maybe that is about all we can do with this evening.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator for making that suggestion. I do think that is all we ought to do tonight. It is clear we cannot finish, and there are commitments that I know Senators must keep. I would hope we could be off this in the next few minutes.

Mr. President, based on the representation made by the manager on this side, and I gather with the concurrence of the manager on the other side, I wish to announce there will be no more record votes tonight.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, before the Senators leave, I should like to ask Mr. DOLE and/or Mr. LONG if there would be any objection to my asking unanimous consent that upon the disposition of the amendment by Mr. LEVIN, I be recognized to call up an amendment to the bill?

My amendment, for the information of the managers, would simply extend additional benefits for up to 8 weeks to all who have exhausted their benefits.

Mr. DOLE. Reachback?

Mr BYRD. Yes; and if the Senator will have no objection, I would like to ask unanimous consent that my amendment be considered following the amendment by Mr. LEVIN on tomorrow.

Mr. DOLE. Does the Senator from Louisiana have any objection to this?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, while the majority and minority leaders are on the floor, and the ranking member, we have, as I understand it, only about three or four additional amendments. I think the amendment by the Senator from West Virginia will require a rollcall, and I assume the one by the Senator from Michigan will require a rollcall. We are trying to negotiate with the two Senators from Illinois, and Senator SPECTER has an amendment, as I have indicated, but we do not have jurisdiction of that area, so we are hopeful that will not be offered.

So I think we might be able to conclude tomorrow morning in a couple of hours, go to conference and get back hopefully tomorrow afternoon so that we might not be here on Saturday.

Mr. BYRD. If the Senator will yield, I would not need over 10 or 15 minutes as far as I am concerned on mine, and if he will yield that I might ask unanimous consent that the amendment be entered and printed overnight, I would so make that request.

(The text of the amendment is printed later under routine morning business.)

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield? He mentioned early tomorrow afternoon. Does the Senator have any guess right now?

Mr. BAKER. If the Senator will yield further, I think that if we could finish this bill—I misspoke myself a minute ago; I thought we passed the House CR. We did not, and there will be a conference on that. We will have to act on that tomorrow.

I would hope we could be out tomorrow by 2 or 3 o'clock. Would the Senator from Kansas agree?

Mr. DOLE. If we could finish the bill pending by noon, go to conference, say, by 1, we would probably end the conference by 3 o'clock. But if we could work it out, there might not be any reason for a rollcall vote. That depends on one Member.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

AMENDMENT NO. 2252

(Purpose: To provide an optional alternative trigger for extended benefits)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, has the Levin amendment been laid down?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. BAKER. Would the Senator from Michigan be inclined to offer his amendment at this time?

Mr. LEVIN. I would be happy to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friend, the majority leader.

I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself, Senators SPECTER and RIEGLE, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN), for himself, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. SPECTER, proposes and amendment numbered 2252.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

OPTIONAL TRIGGER FOR EXTENDED BENEFITS

SEC. ——. Section 203 of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"OPTIONAL STATE EXTENDED BENEFIT PERIODS

"(f)(1) Any State may provide that an extended benefit period may be in effect in such State in accordance with the provisions of this subsection, for weeks which are not otherwise in an extended benefit period as determined under the preceding provisions of this section.

"(2) For purposes of this subsection there shall be a State 'on' indicator for weeks beginning in a calendar quarter if the rate of insured unemployment in the State equals or exceeds the applicable percentage (determined under paragraph (3)) for the period consisting of all weeks which begin on or after January 1, 1982, and in or before the second preceding calendar quarter. For purposes of this subsection there shall be a State 'off' indicator for weeks beginning in a calendar quarter for which there is no 'on' indicator.

"(3) For purposes of paragraph (2), the applicable percentage shall be—

"(A) 6 percent, in which case there shall be a 10-week benefit period in effect for eligible individuals in such State;

"(B) 5 percent, but less than 6 percent, in which case there shall be an 8-week benefit period in effect for eligible individuals in such State; or

"(C) 4 percent, but less than 5 percent, in which case there shall be a 6-week benefit period in effect for eligible individuals in such State.

"(4) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the amount established in the account of an eligible individual who has a period of eligibility solely by reason of this subsection shall be equal to—

"(A) 1⅔ of the amount which would otherwise be established in such account under section 202(b) in the case of an individual in a 10-week benefit period;

"(B) ⅔ of the amount which would otherwise be so established in the case of an individual in an 8-week benefit period; and

"(C) ⅓ of the amount which would otherwise be so established in the case of an individual in a 6-week benefit period.

"(5) Any State which chooses to allow extended benefit periods in accordance with this subsection shall provide that any individual eligible for extended compensation solely by reason of this subsection may decline eligibility for such compensation, and for purposes of the State's plan under part A of title IV of the Social Security Act such compensation shall not be considered to be available to such individual. Any choice to decline eligibility for such compensation shall terminate any rights to such compensation.

"(6) The provisions of this subsection shall apply only to calendar quarters beginning on or after October 1, 1983, and ending on or before March 31, 1985.".

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, this amendment would, at a State's option, make a State eligible for 10 weeks of extended benefits, if that State's average insured unemployment rate from January 1982 is 6 percent or above.

That is exactly the same measure that the committee used to make sure that some States would indeed qualify for the highest tier of Federal supplemental benefits.

Further, the amendment would prove 8 weeks of extended benefits if the State's average insured unemployment rate over that period is between 5 and 6 weeks, and 6 weeks of benefits if the average IUR is between 4 and 5 percent.

Based on current data, 34 States would benefit from this amendment immediately at their option.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a list of those States.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I yield the floor and would be happy to pick up in the morning.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past 6:55 p.m. in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR FRIDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 11 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. In view of the report of the Senator as to the number of amendments and those requiring rollcall votes, I think it would be best to change the convening hour from 11 to 10 a.m. tomorrow to give us a little more time and improve the prospects that we can get out fairly early tomorrow afternoon.

I make that request at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am told that two Senators have requested special orders for in the morning. I ask unanimous consent that special orders be granted in favor of Senators METZENBAUM and NUNN of not to exceed 15 minutes in length and in that order to be placed immediately after the time for the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in addition to the special orders previously authorized for tomorrow, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) be recognized, as third in sequence after the other special orders tomorrow, for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUBREY SHERWOOD

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, an outstanding South Dakota citizen—Mr. Aubrey Sherwood of De Smet—was inducted recently into the South Dakota Western and Cowboy Heritage Hall of Fame in Pierre. Mr. Sherwood was cited for his contributions to the communications field during his 57 years as a reporter, editor and publisher at the De Smet News. He richly deserved this honor. Mr. Sherwood has long been recognized as a pioneering newspaperman. I regard him personally as one of the most colorful figures in the weekly newspaper world.

In addition, Aubrey Sherwood is known as an intensely community-minded citizen who has worked for decades to promote civic, cultural, and commercial activities in De Smet and elsewhere in South Dakota.

An editorial in the September 21, 1983, edition of the De Smet News mentions some of the contributions he has made over the years. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the De Smet News, Sept. 21, 1983]

OUR HAT IS OFF TO AUBREY SHERWOOD

(By Dale Blegen)

Our hat is off this week to Aubrey Sherwood on his induction into the South Dakota Western and Cowboy Heritage Hall of Fame in Pierre.

Sherwood was inducted in the communications category. A dozen or so others were inducted last week in other categories.

This is but one of many awards Sherwood has received for his 57 years as reporter, editor and publisher at The De Smet News. He is modest about this latest award and says such an honor may well come to anyone who has spent that many years in newspapering.

We don't think that is a correct observation and it downplays the significant contributions Sherwood has made to De Smet and to South Dakota.

The Sherwood family published The De Smet News for 93 years. The sale of the paper in 1977 encompassed a period that began four years before South Dakota became a state and grew through the pioneering era, the Great Depression and into the space age of the late 20th century.

Aubrey Sherwood was a part of the newspaper from 1919 until he sold it in 1977. During that time he amassed a long list of accomplishments.

He promoted civic activities, commerce and the cultural heritage of his hometown.

He enjoyed a long and lasting friendship with Harvey Dunn, the prairie painter, and used his newspaper to promote interest in Dunn and his works. Sherwood was instrumental in getting Dunn to bring a collection of his paintings to De Smet in 1950.

The artist made a permanent gift of 35 of those paintings to South Dakota State University after that exhibition. He would have permanently displayed them in De Smet had there been a suitable building.

Aubrey Sherwood gets much of the credit for that contribution to South Dakota.

And Sherwood used his newspaper to promote the writings of Laura Ingalls Wilder, author of the "Little House" books which provided the basis for the recent television series, "Little House on the Prairie."

He was instrumental in forming the Laura Ingalls Wilder Memorial Society which has preserved the author's heritage in De Smet and forms the nucleus of De Smet's tourist industry based on interest in Mrs. Wilder.

It's true he spent many years in the newspaper field. Perhaps that alone is worth recognizing. But many have spent long years in a profession; few have made significant, lasting contributions to both community and state.

Aubrey Sherwood is one who has made those contributions and has deserved the honors given him.

Our hearty congratulations.

AGENT ORANGE STUDIES

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as you know, there has been a great deal of concern among Vietnam veterans, their loved ones, and the American public as to what the long-term health effects of exposure to agent orange, the herbicide sprayed in Vietnam, really are.

Since the concern about the health effects of exposure to agent orange first came to national attention in 1978, a number of studies on agent orange and dioxin, the toxic contaminant contained in it, have been undertaken. Although the major studies—including the epidemiological study of Vietnam veterans mandated by Congress in Public Law 96-151—have yet to be completed, two studies of interest to the Congress have recently been released and have received considerable publicity: These are the Australian Government's birth defects study and a paper by Dr. A. Milford Ward of Sheffield, England, on the immune capability of industrial workers exposed to dioxin.

Because of the great interest in these studies, I asked the Office of Technology Assessment (OTA) to review and comment on them, with specific reference to their relevance for Vietnam veterans exposed to agent orange.

Mr. President, I also want the Senate to be aware of two other matters pertaining to agent orange studies. First, on receiving the OTA's July 8, 1983, review of the protocol prepared by the Centers for Disease Control for the epidemiological study of Vietnam veterans that I referred to earlier, I was pleased that the OTA had approved the protocol. However, I was concerned by certain points raised in this review and wrote to the study's principal investigator, Dr. David Erickson, at the CDC to outline my concerns.

Second, I have been concerned for some time now that as much as possible be learned about the health of our Vietnam veterans from the Veterans' Administration Agent Orange Registry. The registry contains information on those veterans who have reported for an agent orange examination at a VA medical center. It has never been made clear for what purposes it was appropriate to use the registry. After recent press reports which quoted a VA official as announcing findings based on the registry—a practice our committee had been informed was not scientifically sound—I wrote on September 26 to the VA's Chief Medical Director, Dr. Donald L. Custis, point out this lack of clarity about the registry and urging that the appropriate uses of the registry be clearly spelled out.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my correspondence with the OTA and its reviews of the two studies, as well as a document prepared by the Centers for Disease Control, in response to a hearing question I asked regarding Dr. Ward's study, and my recent letters to the VA's Chief Medical Director and the CDC principal agent orange investigator be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., April 27, 1983.

Dr. JOHN H. GIBBONS,
Director, Office of Technology Assessment, U.S. Congress, Washington, D.C.

DEAR JOHN: As you know, the Commonwealth Institute of Health, University of Sydney, conducted a study entitled "Case-Control Study of Congenital Anomalies and Vietnam Service". The report was submitted to the Australian Minister for Veterans' Affairs on January 24, 1983.

The study's conclusion, as stated in the summary of the report, that "[t]here is no evidence that Australian Army service in Vietnam has increased the risk of the birth of a [veteran's] child with an anomaly", is naturally of great interest to those members of the U.S. Armed Forces in Vietnam concerned about any excess risk of parenting birth-defective children. Thus, I would very much appreciate your review and comment on this study, particularly your evaluation of the methods used and the conclusions drawn from the data collected.

I have always found the OTA's reviews of studies and surveys related to the health effects of exposure to phenoxy herbicides most valuable and have appreciated the opinions and perspective they provide on such matters.

Thank you for your continuing cooperation with the Committee.

With warm regards,
Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF TECHNOLOGY ASSESSMENT,
Washington, D.C., June 14, 1983.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR ALAN: Enclosed is OTA's review of the Australian Government's "Case-Control Study of Congenital Anomalies and Vietnam Service," which you requested. If you have any questions about the review or would like further information about the study, please contact Michael Gough or Hellen Gelband in the OTA Health Program, at 226-2070.

REVIEW OF THE AUSTRALIAN "CASE-CONTROL STUDY OF CONGENITAL ANOMALIES AND VIETNAM SERVICE"

(Staff Memorandum Prepared by the OTA Health Program)

Description of the study

The Australian Government released the results of its study of congenital anomalies (birth defects) and Vietnam service in January of this year. Begun in 1981, the study was conducted by the Australian Veterans Health Studies, an independent unit of the Commonwealth Institute of Health. The investigators conclude: "There is no evidence that Army service in Vietnam has increased the risk of the birth of a child with an anomaly."

The Australian study uses a case-control design. "Cases" are babies born with birth defects, both live births and stillbirths, between 1966 and 1979 inclusive. "Controls" are babies born without birth defects, including only live births. Cases were identified from all births in 34 selected hospitals and from the records of four cytogenetics laboratories in two regions of Australia. Several potential controls were chosen for each case, matched according to hospital, birth date and maternal age. An attempt was made to ascertain the father's name for each case. If the case father was successfully identified, a similar effort was made to identify one potential control father. In all, 8,517 case-control pairs, for which information about both fathers was available, were included in the study.

To determine whether an association exists between service in Vietnam and fathering a child with a birth defect, the fathers of all case and control babies were classified according to whether or not they had served in the Army, and further whether or not they had served in Vietnam. The number of Vietnam veteran fathers among cases and controls was then compared. One hundred twenty-seven fathers of cases and 123 fathers of controls had served in Vietnam. The report states:

"According to the standard statistical estimation procedure, there is a 95 percent chance that the true value of the risk of a Vietnam veteran fathering a malformed child compared with that of a non-veteran lies between 0.78 (a 22 percent decrease) and 1.32 (a 33 percent increase). The most likely estimate of the risk is 1.02, only 2 percent greater than no difference at all in risk."

The Australian study was designed to be a relatively simple, quick way to find out if serving in Vietnam increased the risk of fathering a child with a birth defect. Some of the features that allowed a rapid completion also place limitations on what can be found out from the study, even in the best case. These limitations are described below. The actual conduct of the study and the biases that might have been introduced into the study are then taken up. Lastly, the relevance of the study to U.S. servicemen is discussed, including a brief comparison of the Australian and CDC birth defects studies.

We have made no attempt to reanalyze the data presented in the report or to obtain additional data. We understand that the Science Panel of the Agent Orange Working Group is planning to request the original data from the study, and some additional information from the Australian government.

Limits imposed by the study design

The study considers all major birth defects together in the analylsis. It was designed to have a very good chance ("high power") to detect even a moderate increase in total birth defects. The study does not have a high probability (it has lower power) of detecting any but extremely large effects in individual birth defects or categories of defects.

It is unlikely that having served in Vietnam would cause a generalized increase in birth defects, though it is reassuring to find out that it did not appear to do so. If an effect exists, it would be more likely to occur in specific categories of defects. This is because birth defects are a heterogeneous group of conditions with many different, though largely unknown, causes. Most are probably associated with exposures of mothers and of fetuses in utero, rather than exposure of prospective fathers.

The study was designed to look at the risk factor of Vietnam service, with no information about specific aspects of that service. Most notably this means no information about Agent Orange exposure. No personal interviews were conducted with either the mothers or the fathers, so little could be done to determine the presence of absence of other risk factors, except for basic information contained in birth records.

The study did not address all adverse reproductive outcomes but was limited to birth defects. Effects on rates of stillbirths and decreased fertility could not be determined.

Concerns arising from the conduct of the study

In case-control studies there exists the possiblity that the selected cases are not representative of the total case population. This is not a problem when all cases arising in a defined population are included. The Australian study took all cases from selected hospitals, but no information is given about what proportion of all cases are included in the 34 hospitals. If the fathers of cases in the study are not representative of all case fathers in terms of their Vietnam veteran status, bias would be introduced which could affect the validity of the results. If veterans are underrepresented among cases, the effect of serving in Vietnam would be underestimated. Selection bias can also work through contols not being representative of the total control population.

Determination of veteran status for cases and controls was accomplished by reviewing records only. Misclassification, assigning non-veteran status to veterans, and vice-versa, can introduce bias, particularly if one group, cases or controls, is subject to greater misclassification than the other. It is not possible to determine the extent of misclassification from the report.

One weakness of the study is that in the overall calculations, men who served in Vietnam only after conception of the child (both cases and controls) are counted the same as men who served before conception. The question of interest surely must be whether service in Vietnam increases the risk of later fathering a child with a birth defect. When the investigators reanalyzed the data including only fathers serving before conception, the results were not changed, but the power to detect an overall increase declines from the values stated in the report.

Relevance of the Australian study to U.S. servicemen

The Australian study provides a measure of assurance that service in Vietnam has not caused a generalized increase in birth defects among the children of veterans. Beyond that, there are difficulties in drawing conclusions about the study's relevance to Americans.

To a large extent, the relevance of the Australian study to American servicemen rests on the degree of similarity of the experiences of American and Australian servicemen and their exposures. A November 1982 report of the Australian Senate Standing Committee on Science and the Environment entitled, "Pesticides and the Health of Australian Vietnam Veterans" made the point that the Australian Government does not believe that Australian servicemen were much exposed to Agent Orange, and that was one reason for not focusing on Agent Orange in this study. If Agent Orange exposure and other exposures were indeed different for Americans and Australians, the extent to which the results of this study can be applied to Americans is lessened. Based on the study report, it is not possible to assess the degree of similarity between conditions of American and Australian service.

The CDC birth defects study should provide information of more direct importance to American veterans. The CDC study includes a larger number of veterans than does the Australian sample. An estimate of Agent Orange exposure for each veteran is being provided by the Army Agent Orange Task Force, and Agent Orange will be studied as a specific risk factor for fathering a child with a birth defect. In addition, a great deal of information from interviews of both mothers and fathers will allow the consideration of other risk factors. The accuracy of information about Vietnam service, because it will be cross-checked from records and inteviews, may also be greater in the CDC study. The problem of selection bias should be less in the CDC than in the Australian study because cases include all children born with birth defects in the Atlanta area, and not just a sample of them. The CDC study, like the Australian study, considers only birth defects, however, and other adverse reproductive outcomes, mainly stillbirths and decreased fertility, will not be addressed.

Summary

In summary, the Australian study revealed no association between Vietnam service and fathering of children with birth defects. While this was appropriate for a first look at the subject, the study did not address specific exposures that might be associated with birth defects and it did not have sufficient power to detect any but very large increases in specific birth defects. This means that if specific exposures, not common to all veterans, did cause an increase in birth defects, or if the increases were only in specific categories, the probability of detecting the association would be low in this study.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
June 23, 1983.

Dr. JOHN H. GIBBONS,

DEAR JOHN: As you know, on June 2, 1983, Congressman Tom Daschle released certain parts of a study entitled "Investigation of the Immune Capability of Workers Previously Exposed to 2, 3, 7, 8-Tetrachlorodibenzo-para-dioxin, TCDD" conducted by Dr. A. Milford Ward of the Department of Immunology, Royal Hallamshire Hospital, Sheffield, England. A copy of this study as released by Congressman Daschle is enclosed for your convenience.

It has been suggested that this study documents that exposure to dioxin can cause a long-term breakdown in the human body's immune system, which, according to Congressman Daschle, "would explain the wide-ranging maladies reported for years by veterans exposed to Agent Orange." A New York Times article of June 3, 1983 (copy enclosed) reported that when Dr. Ward was reached by the Associated Press in Sheffield, England, he "said he found that workers exposed to large doses of dioxin in a chemical plant explosion about 14 years ago suffered depression of their immune systems that 'leaves them open to minor infection,' such as the common cold, but added that there was no evidence of any increased incidence of more serious diseases."

In view of the interest in this study and its findings in terms of the question of the long-term adverse health effects of Agent Orange, confusion about the meaning of the study's results should be cleared up as soon as possible. Thus, I would very much appreciate the review and comment on this study by the Office of Technology Assessment, including an appraisal of what conclusions regarding the effects of TCDD on the human immune system can be drawn from it and the significance, in lay terms, of Dr. Ward's findings. I would also appreciate learning your views on what follow-up work, if any, to Dr. Ward's study would be appropriate and what entity should carry out such work.

I have always found the OTA's reviews of studies and surveys related to the health effects of exposure to substances contaminated by dioxin most valuable and have appreciated the opinions and perspective they provide on such matters. I look forward to receiving the results of your review of Dr. Ward's study.

Thank you for your continuing cooperation with the Committee.

With warm regards,

Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF TECHNOLOGY ASSESSMENT,
August 5, 1983.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR ALAN: Enclosed is the review of Dr. A. Milford Ward's paper, "Investigation of the Immune Capability of Workers Previously Exposed to 2,3,7,8-Tetrachlorodibenzo-para-dioxin (TCDD)," which you requested. Because Dr. Ward's study was commissioned as part of a larger study, the paper reporting the full study is also briefly reviewed. That paper is titled "Tetrachlorodibenzodioxin: a Survey of Subjects Ten Years after Exposure," written by George May. As requested, the review also includes a suggestion for further research which might logically follow Dr. Ward's study.

A copy of this review is also being sent to Congressman Montgomery, as he requested in a letter to me earlier this month.

If you have any questions about the review or further questions about the studies, please contact me, or Michael Gough or Hellen Gelband in the OTA Health Program (6-2070).

Sincerely,

JOHN H. GIBBONS.

OFFICE OF TECHNOLOGY ASSESSMENT REVIEW OF TWO PAPERS REPORTING ON LONG-TERM EFFECTS OF EXPOSURE TO DIOXIN

Two papers which report details of examinations of workers exposed to dioxin are reviewed. The first, "Investigation of the immune capability of workers previously exposed to 2,3,7,8-tetrachlorodibenzo-paradioxin (TCDD)" was carried out by Dr. A. Milford Ward as part of a survey of workers ten years after they had been exposed in an industrial accident. It is of special interest because of the importance attached to his finding differences between the immunologic profiles of exposed and unexposed individuals. As the review points out, it is by no means clear what the small differences mean in terms of the health of the workers.

The second paper, by George May, "Tetrachlorodibenzodioxin: a survey of subjects ten years after exposure" (British Journal of Industrial Medicine 39:128135, 1982) provides the context in which Dr. Ward's work was carried out. It reports additional health information and the results of laboratory tests other than the immunologic tests.

The individuals studied were employees of the English firm, Coalite Oils and Chemicals Ltd., who were present during a 1968 accident in the manufacture of 2,4,5-trichlorophenol (TCP). The accident released crude TCP containing a "higher than normal concentration" of TCDD (May, 1982). As a result of the accident, 79 people developed chloracne, including cases among workers exposed at the time of the accident and others exposed during clean-up of the plant. Over the next several years, through 1973, additional cases of chloracne arose from new exposures in the plant, bringing to 90 the total number of individuals (including one wife and two children of workers) diagnosed with chloracne since 1968.

Both papers reviewed here are based on a survey, carried out in 1978, that included three groups of individuals: Group A, 31 "controls" with no history of dioxin exposure; Group B, 54 workers with possible exposure to dioxin but no history of chloracne; and Group C, 41 of the original 90 individuals with a history of chloracne.

DR. WARD'S STUDY

Dr. Ward analyzed blood samples from each individual in the three groups for certain immunologic information. (His groups i), ii), and iii) correspond to May's Groups, C, B, and A, respectively.) The study reports results from examining levels of five immunoglobulins; total lymphocyte counts; T-cells and B-cells; and a lymphocyte transformation assay in response to phytohaemagglutin (PHA). Differences between study groups and the "reference ranges" were reported for two of the immunoglobulins (IgM and IgD) and the PHA assay. The sources and numerical values of reference ranges are not given.

IMMUNOGLOBULIN M (IGM)

Although the range of values and the median value for all groups were not significantly different, Group C, the chloracne group, had a higher proportion of individuals with values below the fifth percentile of the reference range.

IMMUNOGLOBULIN D (IGD)

Groups B and C had higher than expected numbers of results below the fifth percentile of the reference range.

PHA

PHA activity was depressed in Group C, though not at a level that would normally be considered "statistically significant."

INTERPRETATION

The meaning of the differences found by Dr. Ward are by no means self-evident. The differences were relatively small, and certainly for none of the individuals in the study were the immunologic profiles diagnostic of any clinical or known pre-clinical condition. Compared with a severely immune-impaired individual (an AIDS patient, for example) the values obtained in this study are unremarkable.

The functions of the immunoglobulins themselves are not well understood, but IgM is relatively better understood than is IgD. IgM initiates the immune response to foreign substances and provides the immune response to certain types of substances. The functions of IgD are largely unknown at this time, so the clinical meaning of a deficit, if one exists, is unclear. Based on May's paper, there is no excess morbidity in any of the groups, though, as discussed below, there are problems with drawing inferences from the study. This does not mean that Dr. Ward's study should be taken as a negative. It suggests further testing of the hypothesis that exposure to dioxin causes some long-term immunological changes in a population.

DR. MAY'S STUDY

The survey consisted of: medical and employment histories, blood and urine testing for a number of biological indicators or markers, some genetic testing based on blood cells, and the immunologic studies that are the subject of Dr. Ward's paper.

Based on all testing, Dr. May concluded, "Apart from persisting minor chloracne in half the subjects, it has not been possible to show any essential difference in any of the parameters studied between those individuals who evinced clinical evidence of dioxin exposure and their colleagues." He does not present Dr. Ward's data in the article.

Any generalization drawn from Dr. Ward's findings about the long-term effects of exposure to dioxin on immune status depend, to a large extent, upon a critical appraisal of May's study design. Several aspects of the design bear examining.

First, fewer than half of the individuals who developed chloracne were included in the survey. Participation depended first upon being still in the employ of the Coalite company, and second upon agreeing to participate. Forty-six, about half of the workers who had had chloracne, still worked for the company, and 41 agreed to participate. The status of the remaining individuals is not discussed, and does not, from the article, appear to be known. Also, it is not clear how many of the 41 were exposed in 1968 and how many were from the later-developing cases. Those who developed chloracne in 1973 would have 5-year followups, the ten years of the article applying only to the 1968 cases.

A worst case scenario for the 44 (of the original 90 chloracne cases) uncontacted individuals is that they are no longer employed by the company because of severe morbidity or because they have all died. While that appears unlikely, it may be that the individuals participating in the study represent the healthier end of the spectrum of workers who originally contracted chloracne. Because of this, conclusions from the studies apply only to the individuals studied, and cannot be generalized to the total population that developed chloracne.

A second major concern is that Groups A and B were formed differently from Group C. Group C was a fraction of a cohort exposed in 1968 (plus some individuals who developed chloracne during the years after the accident). Group A, termed "controls," was drawn from 1978 laboratory and management personnel. These people had no dioxin exposure, according to May. They do not belong to a 1968 cohort of any kind, as far as one can tell from the paper. Because of the different way they were chosen in comparison with Group C, they would not be considered a valid control group for an epidemiologic study. Aside from differences in cohort formation, the individuals in Group A were different in their work history, being drawn mainly from laboratory and management. Their social class, educational level and other demographic features probably differ from Group C, as May acknowledges, and those differences are known to affect some health characteristics.

Group B are termed "possibly exposed" plant workers with some laboratory and management staff. There is too little information in the paper to determine just how the cohort was formed or how probable their exposure to dioxin was.

SUGGESTED FOLLOW-UP

Dr. Ward's findings are suggestive of a long-term change in the immunological profile of individuals exposed to dioxin. His study has been used in public forums to support much stronger claims about major breakdowns of the immune system that presumably lead to clinical disease. Dr. Ward's study alone does not support such claims. The differences he found are small and their importance is unknown. However, because of the importance of immunologic contributions to disease, the idea that TCDD has effects on the immune system deserves further examination.

A starting point would be to review the literature for similar studies that may have been done. OTA is not aware of any other published studies, but Dr. Joseph K. Prince, who appeared with Congressman Daschle at a news conference in June of this year, mentioned that Dr. Ward's study corroborated his own findings in a study of railroad workers exposed to dioxin during an accident in 1979. Information from that study might be useful in working out the details of a followup, as suggested below.

The hypothesis that long-term immunologic changes are initiated by exposure to dioxin can be tested. To do this, a suitable battery of tests should be developed with the advice of immunologists. The tests may include those Dr. Ward used, but because a great deal of progress in immunology has been made in the past few years, there may be more appropriate and certainly additional tests that should be considered. A well-designed epidemiologic study with a cohort known to have been exposed to dioxin and an unexposed, but otherwise similar, cohort should be tested and the results compared.

Assembling the exposed cohort might be facilitated by using the NIOSH dioxin worker registry as a source. The registry attempts to include all U.S. workers who have been engaged in the production of 2, 4, 5-T, including all known to have been involved in industrial accidents similar to the one at the Coalite plant. Controls would be a group with similar backgrounds and work experience but no dioxin exposure. The study would not necessarily include all workers in the registry. It might focus, for instance, on workers exposed during accidents. The size of the study would have to be worked out by the study designers, depending on the size of the effect expected, and the desired power to detect an effect.

There is a focus of immunologic expertise at NIH at present. The possibility of a joint NIOSH-NIH study might be explored to capitalize on the occupational epidemiologic experience of NIOSH, and the immunologic experience of NIH, specifically the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases (NIAID).

At this time it appears premature to include a much expanded immunologic component in CDC's Agent Orange or Vietnam Experience studies. CDC does plan to include some immunologic testing in those studies, but as far as OTA is aware, the exact tests have not yet been decided upon. Some immunologic testing was included in the Ranch Hand study, and those results, when they are available, might suggest an appropriate direction for CDC.

SUMMARY OF WARD AND ERICKSON MEETING ON JUNE 15, 1983

I met with Dr. A. Milford Ward, Royal Hallamshire Hospital, Sheffield, UK, in his office at the Royal Hallamshire on June 15, 1983. Dr. Ward and I discussed his immunological studies of men who were exposed to TCDD in the coalite Oils and Chemicals accident of 1968. The health experience of these men since the accident has been summarized by G. May (British Journal of Industrial Medicine 1982:39:128-135). Dr. Ward and I also briefly discussed what immunological analyses CDC might incorporate into its studies of Vietnam veterans.

Dr. Ward began the meeting by saying that he had not found much in the way of significant immunological differences between TCDD exposed and non-exposed workers at the Coalite Plant. In summary, he felt that there was some evidence of alterations in immunological "short term memory" capability and some relatively minor differences in absenteeism, with the exposed group experiencing slightly more absenteeism (2 or 3 days, I believe).

Dr. Ward and I discussed the discrepancy between his statement that exposed workers had somewhat more work absences than the unexposed group and the statement in May's 1982 paper of just an opposite effect. May's data derived from "certified" absences only; whereas, Ward included data on uncertified absences. In addition, Ward cannot be sure that he was in possession of complete data.

We spoke of 2 design issues: 1) Dr. Ward knew to which group his study subjects belonged but he did not know the exposure studies of the 3 groups (i.e., he knew which study subjects belonged to groups A, B, and C but he did not know which of the groups were composed of exposed men and which were not).

The "unexposed" group A, comprised primarily managers and chemists, whereas groups B and C were primarily production workers. Dr. Ward did not believe that this difference would be important for the laboratory analyses of immunological competence but did feel that it might be of concern insofar as the comparisons of absenteeism are concerned.

Atlanta, Ga.

DEAR DR. ERICKSON: I am writing in connection with the Office of Technology Assessment's (OTA) July 8, 1983 review of the Centers for Disease Control's protocol for the epidemiological study of Vietnam veterans required by Public Law 96-151, as modified by Public Law 97-72. I was pleased by the many positive comments of OTA on the protocol and the fact that the protocol was approved by OTA. After reviewing the OTA comments, four points, in particular, concern me.

First, on pages 11-12 of the review, OTA discusses the premise—on which OTA states the Vietnam Experience Study is based—that, once classified into a particular military occupational specialty, whether an individual went to Vietnam or served elsewhere was simply a matter of luck. As OTA points out, and I am sure you are very aware, if the "luck of the draw" premise is not sound and there was some explicit or implicit basis for selection for Vietnam service, the preexisting differences between those who did and did not go to Vietnam might be related to differences in their health status today. According to OTA, "there is little hard evidence" on this issue and the "luck of the draw" premise is "basically taken on faith." Because the validity of this premise could be of such great importance to the validity of the results of the entire study, I believe that every effort should be made to ensure that all evidence that might support or rebut the premise is discovered and fully evaluated. Thus, I would greatly appreciate your advising me as to the efforts that have been made to ascertain what the Army's personnel policies and practices were during the Vietnam war with respect to selecting troops for assignment to Vietnam and what those policies and practices were. I would also be interested in learning what difficulties you may have encountered in discovering how troops were selected to be sent to Vietnam and whether you have been satisfied with the assistance and cooperation that the Army has provided. In addition, please let me know the degree to which you are satisfied that the "luck of the draw" is a valid premise on which to base the Vietnam Experience Study and whether you believe that any further steps should be taken to learn the factors that may have influenced the selection of an enlisted man for duty in Vietnam.

Second, on page 18, OTA recommends that additional consideration be given to including birth defects in the interview questionnaire. The possibility that Vietnam veterans' exposure to Agent Orange could cause birth defects in their children is a matter of deep personal concern to many of the veterans and their spouses. Thus, I would be interested in the CDC response to and comments on this OTA recommendation. Does the fact that CDC is very close to completing a birth defects study designed to detect increases in birth defects among the natural children of Vietnam veterans have any bearing on the advisability or desirability of including birth defects in the questionnaire?

Third, in the discussion of chromosome studies on page 19 of the review, OTA suggests that CDC reconsider its decision not to carry out chromosome analyses. Although OTA notes that it is correct that no medical conditions are associated with chromosomal aberrations, it believes some useful information might still be gained from the information. Thus, OTA stated:

"[I]f chromosomal analyses for gaps, breaks, and other abnormalities were done on, say, 500 of each cohort in the Agent Orange study and no differences were found, it would answer questions about whether or not there were any such effects. On the other hand, if elevated frequencies of abnormal chromosomes were found, it might be possible to relate the elevated frequencies to other effects in the cohorts. These analyses cannot be carried out on stored blood samples; they would have to be begun within a day of drawing blood from the veteran."

As with the recommendation to include birth defects in the study, I would appreciate knowing your response to this suggestion.

Finally, on page 24, in the discussion of the power of the soft tissue sarcoma study, OTA raises a question as to the prevalence of Vietnam veterans in the National Cancer Institute's Surveillance, Epidemiology and End Results (SEER) population from which the cases for the study will be obtained. OTA suggests that a survey in some or all SEER areas to determine the prevalence could be incorporated into the pretest of this study and notes that, without that determination, there appears to be a risk of starting the study and finding out after a year or two that the study lacks the expected power. This would seem to be a most unfortunate result, and I urge you to consider conducting such a pre-study survey.

I appreciate and support CDC's effort to get this study under way as quickly as possible and to consult with as many interested parties as possible in the process of doing so. I look forward to receiving your comments on the four aspects of the OTA's review described above.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., September 26, 1983.

Dr. DONALD L. CUSTIS,
Chief Medical Director, Veterans' Administration, 810 Vermont Avenue NW., Washington, D.C.

DEAR DON: I am writing to express my great disappointment over statements attributed to Dr. Alvin Young of the VA's Agent Orange Projects Office as reported in articles in the Washington Post (August 30), the New York Times (August 30), and the Chemical and Engineering News (September 11), copies of each of which are enclosed. According to these press reports, Dr. Young, basing his remarks on information gathered from the VA's Agent Orange Registry, stated to the American Chemical Society, "Nothing stands out as related to dioxin or Agent Orange exposure. . . . There were a wide variety of health problems, but they were of the sort that one sees in a population of males growing older." He is also reported to have made statements comparing the incidence of certain diseases found in the Registry to the incidence that would be predicted to be found in a comparable, unexposed population of American males.

Dr. Young's statements directly contradict prior stated positions of agency officials regarding the purpose and appropriate use of the Agent Orange Registry data. On numerous occasions, the VA has strongly emphasized—perhaps most recently in written responses to questions I submitted in connection with this Committee's June 15 hearing—that it is not meaningful to use the Registry to draw conclusions as to the health of Vietnam veterans or the possible health effects of exposure to Agent Orange. (Specific examples of such VA statements are quoted below.) I am deeply concerned that public confidence in the sincerity of the VA's efforts to learn about and disseminate information regarding the health effects of Agent Orange exposure may be seriously eroded by this kind of apparently inconsistent VA practice on this point.

This incident reinforces the need—which was previously highlighted by the recommendation of the General Accounting Office's October 25, 1982, report (HRD 83-6) that the agency discontinue the Registry—to define precisely what are the appropriate uses and limitations of the Agent Orange Registry.

The following two types of analyses using Registry data have been the cause for considerable confusion in the past:

Proportionate Morbidity Analyses: On April 27, 1983, Dr. Barclay Shepard, Director of the VA's Agent Orange Projects Office, testifying before the House Subcommittee on Compensation and Pension, described how the Agent Orange Projects Office had determined the number of soft tissue sarcomas in the Registry and had compared this number to the total number of malignancies in the Registry. Dr. Shepard noted that these results were then compared to the prevalence of soft tissue sarcomas among malignancies generally.

However, in connection with the Senate Committee's June 15 hearing, I specifically asked (question No 3(i) and (ii)) for a comparison of the number of soft tissue sarcomas and the total number of malignancies in the Registry, and the agency replied: "This number means little, even as relative to the occurrence of other malignancies . . . Such as comparison is not meaningful and any figures would be misleading."

In response to a further question (question No. 3 (iii)) as to the relationship between the numbers of soft tissue sarcomas and malignancies in the Registry as compared to the proportion of soft tissue sarcomas among malignancies in the general population, the agency replied: "The Agent Orange Registry contains a self-selected sample that is not representative even of the Vietnam veteran population. Any comparison with the general population would be fallacious."

Has this type of analysis now become appropriate and meaningful, and, if so, what qualifications should be attached to any presentation of the results of such analysis?

Standardized Morbidity Analyses: Comparisons of the incidence of certain diseases (such as soft tissue sarcoma or lymphoma) in the Registry with the incidence of those diseases in U.S. male populations of similar age.

The New York Times article stated:

"[Dr. Young] said that 20 lymphomas had been found among the 85,000 veterans, whereas 15 might have been expected in a comparable population of young males who had not been exposed to the herbicide.

"However, soft tissue sarcomas, a rare form of cancer that has often been attributed to dioxin, actually showed up in smaller numbers than expected; there were only 11 cases where 16 might have been predicted in a population of comparable size and characteristics, he said."

In contrast, a prior statement by Dr. Shepard at the November 11, 1981, hearing before this Committee would suggest that such comparisons should not be made. In response to a question I asked about the value of the registry, Dr. Shepard replied:

"I think it's a valuable source of information, but I would caution the registry participants consist of self-selected group of individuals. Therefore, one cannot readily use the registry data as an epidemiological tool because the principal factor that this group has in common is that they are worried about exposure to agent orange. It would be difficult to establish a control group against which to compare this group of individuals. We certainly can provide descriptive materials as to what the problems are and what complaints these veterans have registered."

These inconsistent approaches by agency officials need to be clarified. On this point, I would also appreciate learning if there does presently exist a "control" population for the Agent Orange Registry as the Chemical and Engineering News article reports.

For the government to respond conscientiously to the concerns raised about Agent Orange, as much information as possible must be learned about the present health of our Nation's Vietnam veterans. The debate over what the Registry can be used for has continued far too long. Certainly, the maximum amount of suggestive information that can possibly be gained from the Registry should be developed, and I urge you, as soon as possible, to address specifically the questions of what information—such as trends, groupings of symptoms, and comparative analyses—can and should be derived from the Registry. A description of the Registry's intended uses and the information gained from it should be made public, and Congress should be informed, on a periodic basis, of the progress in making the necessary analyses.

I am equally concerned about the need to guard against inappropriate and conflicting interpretations of Registry data by the VA and strongly urge that you act to prevent such occurrences. There is already more than enough misleading information about Agent Orange.

As always, I greatly appreciate your cooperation in matters involving America's veterans. I look forward to hearing from you on these matters.

With warm regards,

Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

AGENT ORANGE STUDY RESULTS

A government scientist reported yesterday that a major Agent Orange study has found no unusual rates of illness among Vietnam veterans, but he cautioned that it may be too soon to draw any firm conclusions.

The scientist, Dr. Alvin Young of the Veterans Administration's Agent Orange Projects Office, said researchers found "a wide variety of health problems" in a study of 85,000 veterans who may have been exposed to the dioxin-contaminated herbicide but the problems were "the kind we see in a population of males growing older."

[From the New York Times, Aug. 30, 1983]

STUDY OF 85,000 VETERANS CALLS PESTICIDE EFFECT VAGUE

WASHINGTON, Aug. 30.—The Veterans Administration reported today that medical examinations and laboratory tests of 85,000 Vietnam veterans who fear they may have been exposed to Agent Orange have revealed no adverse health effects clearly related to the chemical defoliant or to its toxic contaminant, dioxin.

"There were a wide variety of health problems," said Alvin L. Young, an Agent Orange expert at the agency, told a news conference at the national meeting of the American Chemical Society, "but they were of the sort that one sees in a population of males growing older."

"Nothing stands out as related to dioxin or Agent Orange exposure," he added.

SLIGHT INCREASE IN LYMPHOMAS

Dr. Young acknowledged that the medical examinations, conducted since 1978, did find "a slight increase" in one form of cancer, known as lymphomas, but he said it is too early to know "if the lymphomas are important." He said that 20 lymphomas had been found among the 85,000 veterans, whereas 15 might have been expected in a comparable population of young males who had not been exposed to the herbicide.

However, soft tissue sarcomas, a rare form of cancer that has often been attributed to dioxin, actually showed up in smaller numbers than expected; there were only 11 cases where 16 might have been predicted in a population of comparable size and characteristics, he said.

Dr. Young said that there was no scientific consensus on whether dioxin can cause soft tissue cancers. A Swedish medical study has suggested it could, he said, but studies in New Zealand and Finland found no strong correlation with soft tissue cancers.

BRIEF TIME FOR DEVELOPMENT

Dr. Young said it had only been 10 to 15 years since many of the veterans were exposed, a period that "may not be long enough" for some cancers to develop. But "at this point in time," he added, "we don't see anything" that confirms a health problem.

The agency's report appeared to have only limited significance in scientific efforts to determine whether exposure to Agent Orange has caused illness among Vietnam veterans. Dr. Young said that the study was not a true epidemiologic study in which a group of veterans known to be exposed to Agent Orange were compared with a carefully matched control group of males not so exposed.

UNCERTAIN ABOUT EXPOSURE

He said many of the 85,000 veterans who feared they were exposed to Agent Orange may not have been; about three-fourths of them said they were not sure.

Many of the people in the control population who were supposedly not exposed to dioxin or similar chemicals may have been exposed at some time. Other papers delivered at the convention reported that dioxins and related chemicals have been found in the fatty tissue of people in the United States and Canada who had not served in Vietnam.

Alastair Hay, a lecturer in chemical pathology at the University of Leeds, in England, noted that if the number of veterans exposed to Agent Orange was significantly fewer than 85,000 then the finding of 11 soft tissue sarcomas might actually be significant.

The Federal Government is sponsoring major epidemiological studies designed to measure whether troops exposed to Agent Orange have suffered more cancer, birth defects or other ailments compared with control groups that were not exposed.

SYMPOSIUM UPDATES HEALTH EFFECTS OF DIOXINS, BENZOFURANS

New findings on several fronts highlighted the Environmental Chemistry Division's three-day symposium on the origin and fate in the environment of the polychlorinated dibenzo-p-dioxins and dibenzofurans. Some of the new developments include:

A report from the Veterans Administration comparing the health of some 85,000 veterans who served in Vietnam with that of other U.S. males of the same age.

Several efforts to develop methods that will establish who actually has been exposed to polychlorinated dioxins or dibenzofurans either in Vietnam or at some other time.

Evidence that dioxin probably does have the capacity to initiate cancer in addition to promoting it.

A historical study showing that although some dioxins and dibenzofurans have been in the environment for a long time, most of what is there now can be traced to the manufacture of synthetic chemicals.

The question of whether dioxins are ubiquitous in the environment or whether their presence comes principally as a consequence of the manufacture of other chemicals has attracted scientific attention since 1978. At that time, Dow Chemical researchers first proposed that many naturally occurring combustion processes produced small, but measurable quantities of dioxins. The company argued that detecting trace levels of dioxins in fish and water samples near its Midland, Mich., manufacturing plant did not mean that the plant was discharging dioxin. Instead, certain low levels of dioxins could be expected anywhere in the environment since the compounds are formed in ordinary combustion processes (C&EN, Feb. 12, 1979, page 23).

The Dow proposals have been viewed with skepticism by many environmental scientists. Basically, the argument of the critics has been that although it may be possible to form dioxins in almost any combustion process, the closer the fuel material is in structure to dioxins, the more likely it is that these compounds will form as combustion products. Dow, too, has modified its view in this direction as more data have become available.

Ronald A. Hites and Jean M. Czuczwa of the school of public and environmental affairs and the department of chemistry at Indiana University presented new findings that add support to this view. They have analyzed four sediment core samples taken from southern Lake Huron to find when polychlorinated dibenzo-p-dioxins and dibenzofurans first began appearing in this region. Using isotope ratios for lead and cesium in the cores, they determined the rate at which sedimentation occurred in these samples. Hites and Czuczwa then measured the concentrations of dioxins and dibenzofurans at various depths in the core samples to determine when these compounds were deposited in the sediments.

"The depth versus concentration profiles in the four cores show that the concentration and presumably the input of polychlorinated dibenzo-p-dioxins and dibenzofurans increased dramatically at a depth corresponding to approximately 1940, grew steadily, and remained high until the present time," Hites says. "Obviously a change occurred in the 1940s resulting in a new source of dioxins and furans," he adds.

This pattern of dioxin deposition corresponds well with historical production trends for chlorinated aromatic compounds, the researchers say, and does not fit other possible sources of dioxins and furans such as coal burning. "We believe that the observed historical increase in polychlorinated dibenzo-p-dioxins and dibenzofuran in the sedimentary records is the result of the combustion of chlorinated precursors present in combustion fuels," the researchers say. "Background levels before 1940 may reflect coal or natural combustion processes."

The validity of these conclusions depends, in part, on the preservation of trapped dioxins and dibenzofurans in sediments for decades. To check this point, the researchers determined the isomer ratios of the various polychlorinated species at different depths in one of the samples. Degradation of dioxins and dibenzofurans in the soil leads to increases in the more highly chlorinated species, but the core sample showed a constant isomer ratio down to the sediment layer that was deposited in about 1870.

Another long-standing scientific question concerning dioxin is whether it can initiate the cancer-forming process in cells. Animal tests, particularly in rats, show clearly that 2,3,7,8-TCDD is an extremely potent carcinogen, but scientific opinion is divided as to whether it can cause cancer by itself or whether its only action is to promote cancer in cells that have already somehow been started on the path to carcinogenesis.

The question revolves around whether dioxin acts on cells by damaging their DNA, thereby causing mutations. Such danger is generally thought to be the first step in the process that leads to cancer, and chemicals that cause it are called mutagens. Alastair W. M. Hay, a chemical pathologist at the University of Leeds, England, presented data from his laboratory that show dioxin to be mutagenic, and therefore an initiator, as well as a promoter, of carcinogenesis. "I believe dioxin actually has the ability to cause cancer by itself," Hay says.

Hay, along with colleagues John Ashby, J. J. Styles, and B. Elliot of Britain's Imperial Chemical Industries, uses a cell transformation test similar, but complementary, to the well-known Ames test to determine dioxin's mutagenicity. This test, called BHK (for baby hamster kidney, the source of the cells used in the test), showed a 90% accuracy rate in discriminating between carcinogens and noncarcinogens in an earlier study of 120 chemicals. "When we used the BHK cell transformation assay with various dioxin isomers, tetrachlorodibenzo-p-dioxin gave a clear, positive response," Hay says. 2,8-Dichlorodibenzo-p-dioxin and 1,3,7-trichlorodibenzo-p-dioxin were both weakly positive in their tests, and the nonchlorinated dibenzo-p-dioxin gave a negative response. These findings parallel the carcinogenic effects expected for these compounds based on tests in animals.

Dioxin's performance as a mutagen in the Ames test is not clearcut, Hay points out. At least two laboratories have reported positive results for dioxin in this test, but many others get a negative finding. "Not all initiators are mutagens in the Ames test," Hay says. Diethylstilbestrol (DES) is one such example. "DES is currently thought to exert its carcinogenic effect through some kind of chromosome damaging action," he says. "2,3,7,8-TCDD may act the same way, and our data in the cell transformation assay indicate that the chemical can transform cells. The mechanism of transformation is still not resolved."

The 85,000 Vietnam veterans whose concerns about the effects possible agent orange exposure may have had on their health led them to join the Veterans Administration's agent orange registry seem to be just as healthy as other U.S. men of the same age, says Alvin L. Young of the VA's agent orange projects office. Though the group has a variety of health problems, Young says, "nothing stands out and says: This is something that is really related to exposure to dioxin."

This does not mean that the dioxin contaminant in agent orange did not cause health effects, Young stresses, but that no effect has been found in the veterans so far. There may have been some transient effects that were gone by the time a veteran was examined or were not recognized by the examining physician at the time and could not be followed up years later when concern about agent orange health effects made physicians more alert for certain symptoms. There may also be long-term health effects that have not developed yet.

The agent orange registry is a compilation of health information on Vietnam veterans who came to VA hospitals concerned about the effects exposure to agent orange and its dioxin contaminant might be having on their health. VA has not confirmed that the people in the registry actually were exposed to agent orange during their Vietnam service; in fact, roughly one quarter of the men in the registry are themselves unsure whether they were exposed to the herbicide. Young points out that since the registry is a self-selected group and people with health problems are more likely to consult a physician, such people are very likely to be overrepresented in the registry. Consequently, VA is careful not to call the registry an epidemiological study. It is merely a compilation of health information on a group of men who served in Vietnam.

Still, it may ease the minds of some Vietnam veterans to know that the very people who were most concerned about the health consequences of their service experience appear to be just about as healthy as the general male population of the U.S. of the same age.

In particular, the registry finds that soft-tissue sarcomas, a very rare cancer type that has been associated with exposure to dioxin-contaminated herbicides in certain Swedish studies, are no more common among registry participants than among the control group. Eleven cases of soft-tissue sarcoma were found among the veterans and 16 in the matched control.

Another finding from examining the registry is that the distribution of people in the registry parallels very closely the distribution of personnel in Vietnam by branch of service. In other words, Army personnel, who made up 67.2% of the armed forces in Vietnam, make up 67.0% of the registry. Similarly, Navy people were 6.3% of the forces in Vietnam and are 6.0% of that registry. This is not the trend that would be expected if agent orange exposure had a large effect on veterans' health, Young says, since Army personnel were much more likely than those of the Navy to have been exposed to agent orange.

There are two classes of cancers for which men in the registry have a slight, but statistically significant, increased incidence over the control population. These are cancers of the buccal cavity and pharynx (with 7.9% of the tumors in the registry in this class compared with 4.5% in the control group) and lymphomas (20.0% in the registry compared with 15.0% in the control). It is too early to tell what these differences mean, Young says, but they will be watched very closely in the future.

The registry's greatest problem is that there is no way to know whether the people in it actually were exposed to agent orange. It seems likely, in fact, that many of them were not exposed to any measurable level of the herbicide or the dioxin in it. Inclusion of such people in the statistical analysis of the registry serves only to mask any effects agent orange or dioxin might have on health. As Alistair Hay points out, for instance, the 11 cases of soft-tissue sarcoma found among people in the registry is not a large number for a group of 85,000. But if only half that number, say, were actually exposed to agent orange and all of the soft-tissue sarcomas were in that group, then the incidence would be high.

Many laboratories are tackling the problem of trying to find some biological marker that can serve to identify just who has been exposed to dioxin. The VA is one of them, and Young described preliminary work on a study to see if adipose tissue could serve as such a marker.

Both dioxins and dibenzofurans concentrate in the fat of laboratory animals, and several scientists have suggested that these compounds might remain concentrated in this tissue in humans long after it has become impossible to detect them in other parts of the body. The VA has made a pilot study along with Michael L. Gross, a chemistry professor at the University of Nebraska, Lincoln. Three groups of male volunteers were included: 20 men who believed they had been exposed to agent orange in Vietnam, 10 who had not been in Vietnam or had other contact with agent orange, and three Air Force officers who had definitely worked with either agent orange or TCDD.

Samples of 10 to 30 g of adipose tissue from the abdominal wall were taken from each volunteer by VA surgeons and analyzed by gas chromatography and high-resolution mass spectrometry by Gross. Fifteen of the samples were re-examined by chemists at the Environmental Protection Agency to confirm Gross' findings.

"The results showed that it is indeed possible to detect and quantify to some degree, at least, 2,3,7,8-TCDD in human fat," Young says. "To be specific, it was present in fat from 13 of the 20 exposed veterans, from nine of the 10 controls, and from all three Air Force officers." The amounts ranged from 3 to 99 parts per trillion. Probably equally significant, however, is the finding that what people thought had been their dioxin exposure did not correlate with the dioxin in their tissues.

The mean dioxin level in the 10 control subjects, who thought that they had not been exposed to agent orange in any way, was 5.7 ± 3.1 ppt, which might be thought of as a very crude estimate of the background level of dioxin in the U.S. population. The mean of the Vietnam veterans was 8.3 ± 6.9 ppt.

Removing 10 to 30 g of adipose tissue is a significant surgical procedure and quite painful. Thus, it is not very promising as a large-scale screening technique to find people whose health might be at risk because of dioxin exposure. A test that might work better for screening purposes is the one being developed by John F. Gierthy and coworkers at the New York State Department of Health.

The assay being developed by the New York scientists is based on work by Joyce C. Knutson and Alan Poland of the University of Wisconsin, Madison. Knutson and Poland demonstrated in 1980 that dioxin and related compounds caused cultures of mouse skin cells to undergo a greater than normal keratinization in vitro. The keratinization process is a normal function of skin cells. It is increased keratinization that is thought to be responsible for the development of chloracne, one of the most common clinical manifestations of dioxin exposure in humans.

In developing a biological screen assay for dioxin, the New York group applied the skin cell model to detection of activity in extracts of soot from a state office building in Binghamton, N.Y., that was involved in an electrical transformer fire. The transformer contained polychlorinated benzenes and polychlorinated biphenyls, which when heated under certain conditions form polychlorinated dibenzo-p-dioxins and other similarly toxic compounds such as polychlorinated dibenzofurans.

Extracts of 10 soot samples, Gierthy says, all caused increased keratinization in the skin cell cultures and all have been shown by chemical analysis to contain polychlorinated dibenzo-p-dioxins and dibenzofurans. The relative keratinization-inducing activity varied among samples, and this variation corresponded well to their degree of contamination as determined by chemical analysis. Thus, Gierthy concludes, the specificity and sensitivity of the in-vitro keratinization assay make it useful as a screen, with high-resolution chemical analysis reserved for identifying specific isomers and congeners in relevant samples.

KANSAS SENDS GOVERNOR CARLIN AND STAFF BEST WISHES FOR A SPEEDY RECOVERY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas rises today to offer best wishes for a full recovery to Kansas' first family, Governor John Carlin and his wife, Karen, as well as the Governor's administrative assistant, Shirley Allen, and security aide, George Bruce.

Early this morning, the Carlins and staff members were riding in a taxicab on their way to National Airport to catch a flight back to Kansas. The automobile was unfortunately involved in an accident when it slammed into the back of a stalled truck. The Governor and his administrative assistant both suffered back injuries and were rushed to an area hospital. Mrs. Carlin and Mr. Bruce, thankfully, were not seriously injured.

Governor Carlin and Ms. Allen are now recuperating in Arlington's National Orthopaedics Hospital.

This Senator can speak for all Kansans in sending our best wishes for a speedy recovery.

HENRY JACKSON EULOGY

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, in the loss of Henry Jackson, we once again see clearly that death cancels everything but truth. He is no longer with us in the flesh, but we know assuredly that even though his passing cancels our earthly interaction with him and the vigorous contribution he daily made to his family, friends, and constituents, it does not cancel, indeed cannot cancel, the truth of his words and deeds. And what a comfort it is to know that in faith the sleep of death is only a temporary hiatus in our fellowship with him. I am reminded of the words of Samuel Butler that "To die completely, a person must not only forget but be forgotten, and he who is not forgotten is not dead."

Scoop was the chairman of the old Interior Committee when I came to the Senate. Much has been said about his concern for the individual and his helpfulness to colleagues of whatever political persuasion. I personally found that true as a freshman Senator and throughout the years of our association. He oriented me to the realities of life in the Senate and encouraged me in my discouragement more times than I can now even recall. He was never limited in his vision for solutions merely to what was good for Washington State, although never was there a more eloquent advocate for the needs of his constituents. In a very real way, the Northwest was his State as the Columbia River was never a barrier. He came across it numerous times, as easily as though it were a county line, to work with the Oregon delegation on matters of mutual interest. And, as we all know, in like manner his love and advocacy for the Native American, the handicapped, the unemployed, and others in need made the Nation his State. Rightly there has been much stated about Scoop's contributions in the areas of energy policy and strengthening our Armed Forces, but from my perspective as a neighbor and friend, his greatest legacy will be framed in the context of his role in the American Indian Health Care Act and his work for the handicapped.

As many of us attended the services for Scoop, our hearts were tugged by the loss that Helen, their children, many relatives, friends and colleagues were suffering. It is a comfort, that I am sure is not lost on Scoop, that we who are left behind are suffering much more than he is. The old parable is always instructive at a time like this which tells of the cheering, laughter, and joy at the launching of a new voyage of life at birth; but the weeping and sorrow at the coming into port of the ship at the end of the cruise of life. Should it not be at least in a measure reversed that we cheer and laugh and rejoice over the fruitful and successful and faithful life of the humble servant who arrives at the end of his life with his reputation intact and his memory revered. Certainly, it is the reality that our repugnance to death is in proportion to the consciousness of a life being lived in vain. Henry Jackson's life was surely not lived in vain. His efforts were monumental. His memory will be a treasure to me the remainder of my days. His faith encourages me all the more to trust that "in fact Christ has been raised from the dead, the first fruit of those who have fallen asleep." And that "He must reign until He has put all His enemies under His feet. The last enemy to be destroyed is death * * *. What is sown is perishable, what is raised is imperishable. It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory. It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power. It is sown a physical body, it is raised a spiritual body." (I Corinthians 15: 20–25, 42–44).

COMMEMORATING THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FORCED FAMINE IN THE UKRAINE

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, this week the "National Committee to Commemorate Genocide Victims in the Ukraine is holding a host of events here in Washington to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the infamous forced famine that took the lives of nearly 7 million Ukrainians in 1932 and 1933.

It is altogether fitting and proper that we should mourn the victims of this terrible tragedy. We have an obligation also to remind the world of the kind of rule that perpetrated one of the greatest crimes civilization has ever known.

For in 1933 the world community was largely silent, and otherwise passive, as Stalin sentenced the entire people of the Ukraine to cruel starvation. Their offense had been to insist upon being Ukrainian, and to want to keep their own plots of land. We must raise our voices in honor of those who were lost and affirm our determination that the world shall never be silent again. The atrocities of Stalin must never be forgotten to history.

Thanks to the "National Committee to Commemorate the Genocide Victims in the Ukraine" the story of this great injustice—virtually ignored by the media and the history books—will be told. The shameful silence of 1933 will never be repeated.

I ask that a July 7, 1983, essay in the Wall Street Journal regarding the forced famine of 1932–33 be printed in the RECORD at this point as well as a collection of press reports from 1933.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORCED FAMINE IN THE UKRAINE: A HOLOCAUST THE WEST FORGOT

(By Adrian Karatnycky)

Fifty years ago this past spring, the normally bountiful fields of the Ukraine were filled with the odor of death. Crows flew over the steppe, awaiting their feast of human carrion. Corpses littered the streets and roadways. In the June 6, 1933, issue of the London Morning Post, Malcolm Muggeridge depicted the follwing scene:

"If you go now to the Ukraine or the North Caucasus, exceedingly beautiful countries and formerly amongst the most fertile in the world, you will find them like a desert; fields choked with weeds and neglected; no livestock or horses; villages deserted; peasants famished, often their bodies swollen, unutterably wretched.

"You will discover if you question them that they have had no bread at all for three months past; only potatoes and some millet, and they are now counting potatoes one by one. . . . They will tell you that many have already died of famine and that many are dying every day; that thousands have been shot by the government and hundreds of thousands exiled."

The devastation Mr. Muggeridge described wasn't caused by any natural catastrophe. It was an entirely new phenomenon—history's first artificial famine: a consequence of Stalin's effort to collectivize agriculture and crush the nationally conscious Ukrainian peasantry.

With the exception of Mr. Muggeridge's reports, William Henry Chamberlin's in the Christian Science Monitor, and the publication of several stories and a number of shocking photographs of starving children in the Hearst newspapers, the Western press was largely silent about the genocide that was occurring in the Soviet Ukraine. Europe and the U.S. were in the throes of the Great Depression. Violence in the streets was common. Fascism was on the march. The forced famine of 1933 had regrettably come at an inopportune time.

Some reporters from the West concealed the truth because of an ideological commitment to Soviet communism. Others, like New York Times correspondent Walter Duranty, were seduced by official favors and access to high government circles into deliberately and shamelessly attempting to suppress the story of the famine, while writing fawning articles on Stalin's rule. For this Mr. Duranty was rewarded with Pulitzer prizes and the Order of Lenin.

None of the day's newspaper reports was able to grasp the enormity of the cataclysm. Today, reliable academic estimates place the number of Ukrainian victims of starvation at 4.5 million to 7 million. This dark event, which rivals in its magnitude the Jewish Holocaust and the massacre of the Cambodians by the Khmer Rouge, is still largely unknown outside the private memories of some survivors.

The famine was in part the byproduct of Stalin's relentless drive to collectivize Soviet agriculture. That stavation was artificially induced is beyond dispute. The famine was a clear result of the fact that between 1931 and 1933, while harvests were precipitously declining, Stalin's commissars continued to requisition and confiscate ever-increasing quantities of grain, much of it exported to Western Europe. Peasants were shot and deported as rich, landowning "kulaks." Most livestock perished from the lack of feed, some as a result of peasant attempts to resist collectivization. Cannibalism was not uncommon. Although no medical quarantine was declared and non-Ukrainians were free to travel into and out of the area, starving villagers who sought to flee areas stricken with famine and its resulting outbreaks of pneumonia, typhus, and tuberculosis were turned back at checkpoints controlled by Soviet patrols that scrupulously enforced newly imposed internal passport regulations.

While the drive to collectivize agriculture was a wideranging phenomenon common to the entire U.S.S.R., only in the Ukraine did it assume a genocidal character. Indeed, there can be no question that Stalin used the forced famine as part of a political strategy whose aim was to crush all vestiges of Ukrainian national sentiment. As he wrote, "The nationality problem is by its essence a peasant problem." The attack against the "kulaks," therefore, was viewed as an attack against the social basis of Ukranian nationalism. Moreover, the famine was accompanied by an extensive purge in the cities of the Ukrainian cultural and political elite—whose leading activists had been the precursors of a national communism similar to that which later emerged in Tito's Yugoslavia and Gomulka's Poland.

Some might ask whether today it is worthwhile to dredge up the memory of yet another act of Stalinist barbarism. What can this event from a dim and receding past tell us that Solzhenitsyn's "Gulag Archipelago" has not? One might be tempted to say that nothing new can be learned from this secret horror. Yet the 1933 famine is important for both moral and political reasons.

There is of course our moral obligation to honor the memory of the nameless victims by depicing the truth. Moreover, it is important to understand the forced famine as a pivotal event in Soviet history, whose consequences remain to this day.

For the famine created a disastrous situation in Soviet agriculture from which the U.S.S.R. still hasn't fully recovered. Moreover, the famine eliminated a substantial segment of the U.S.S.R.'s non-Russian population, thus ensuring that the Soviet Union would remain for the next five decades a state dominated by an absolute Russian majority. Finally, the famine caused an enormous rift within the Ukrainian nation, which had long been nationally assertive. To this day, independent and national sentiment among Eastern Ukrainians is much lower than among Western Ukrainians (who, in 1933, as part of Poland, were spared the trauma of the famine and the Great Terror).

Yet despite the pivotal importance of the forced famine, for 50 years its full story has remained untold. Not one serious book on this tragedy is available in English.

Today—at a time when some would recast Soviet communism in a friendlier mold, the better to negotiate arms reductions with—may once again be an inopportune time to bring up the terrible loss of life and the painful trauma of the brutally scarred Ukrainian nation. Yet 50 years seems too long to remain silent about one of the greatest crimes in mankind's history.

CONTEMPORARY PRESS ACCOUNTS OF THE 1932-33 FAMINE IN THE UKRAINE

"On a recent visit to the Northern Caucasus and Ukraine, I saw something of the battle that is going on between the government and the peasants . . . On the one side, millions of starving peasants, their bodies often swollen from lack of food; on the other, soldier members of the GPU carrying out the instructions of the dictatorship of the proletariat. They had gone over the country like a swarm of locusts and taken away everything edible; they had shot or exiled thousands of peasants, sometimes whole villages; they had reduced some of the most fertile land in the world to a melancholy desert." (Malcolm Muggeridge, THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW, London, May 1, 1933)

"Since the fall of 1932 the food problem has deteriorated in a catastrophic manner. In some localities 20-30 persons are dying daily. Entire houses are deserted. The government officials are not at all interested in the hunger misfortune." (Walter Eidlitz, DIE NEUE ZUERICHER ZEITUNG, September 1, 1935)

"The famine started when the authorities took all the grain away from the people. Children under 14 years were first to feel the pangs of hunger. Only the strongest are managing to exist, the majority are dying." (DAILY TELEGRAPH, London, September 9, 1933)

"The famine in Ukraine was created by Moscow artifically from political considerations. In order to completely destroy all aspirations toward independence, the Soviet government organized a man-made famine with the purpose of destroying the entire people whose only sin is the longing for freedom." (Suzanne Bertillion, LE MATIN, Paris, December 31, 1933)

"New censorship measures exclude accredited foreign correspondents from . . . Ukraine, and the Northern Caucasus, where a great famine was known to have raged during the winter and spring . . ." (P. B. Barnes, THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE, August 21, 1933)

"Yes, . . . we saw it with out own eyes in Ukraine—real unrestrained famine ravaged . . . along with hunger, typhus, swollen naked corpses, empty villages whose inhabitants have been deported, died or run away, and with cannibalism that has ceased to be a punishable crime." (JEWISH DAILY FORWARD, New York, December 27, 1933)

MIDDLE CLASS DRUG ABUSE

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, we tend to forgive and forget many of the people who are most conspicuous in their use of illicit drugs. I mean, of course, the actors, actresses, sports figures, rock stars. We overlook and excuse them because they are not "one of us"—they do not move in our polite circles; they are "fringe types," not "establishment." But what we are just beginning to realize, in our own stuffy and secure existences, is that illicit drug abusers are very much with us—they socialize with us; they are our friends, our business associates; they marry our children. We should now face the ugly fact that illegal drug abusers have moved in and become part of the family. To use Pogo's expression, "We have met the enemy, and he is us."

Mr. President, on September 13, 1983, Senator HELMS entered into the RECORD an excellent article by the Wall Street Journal on the subject of cocaine abuse by the upper middle class, specifically, stock traders in our Nation's financial centers. I would like to add to this and enter into the RECORD at this point an article on the increase in heroin abuse by the middle class.

MIDDLE CLASS HEROIN USE REPORTEDLY ON INCREASE

(By Todd B. Bates)

Heroin, the urban scourge of the 1970s, is maintaining its way into the middle classes of Middlesex and Somerset counties, according to local drug treatment officials.

More and more middle income people have been getting booked on heroin in the past few years, eventually showing up an local methadone clinics for treatment, officials said.

"So many people out there want to buy the stuff," said Detective Michael Buchinski, head of Somerset's Narcotic Task Force.

His assessment comes in the wake of a drug raid last week in Franklin, which uncovered perhaps the largest heroin operation ever in Somerset County, according to officials.

But, while overall heroin usage appears to be increasing in Somerset, the opposite seems to be happening in Middlesex, according to law enforcement officials.

SUCCESSFUL CRACKDOWN

That's because of a recent successful crackdown on drug use in Perth Amboy and an effort to keep organized heroin operations out of Middlesex, officials said.

The 15-month Perth Amboy crackdown that ended in January resulted in more than 400 arrests, a huge jump in business at the Perth Amboy Addiction Center and a 33 percent reduction in crime in 1982, according to officials. Heroin use had been increasing until the crackdown, said Detective Steve Polaka.

In any case, hundreds of addicts in the two counties may each be responsible for several hundred crimes a year, committed to support $50 to $200 a day habits, according to estimates.

Many burglaries, armed robberies, thefts and muggings are attributed to heroin addicts, law enforcement officials said.

Joseph Guadagnino, executive director of the New Brunswick Counseling Center in Morris Street, estimates that 2,000 to 3,000 regular users live in Middlesex County. Somerset officials declined to offer estimates.

An estimated 35,000 users live in New Jersey compared with 30,000 in 1978 and 42,000 in 1975, according to John French, chief of research and evaluation for the state Department of Health's Division of Narcotic and Drug Abuse Control.

Heroin supplies reached a low point in 1978, French noted.

Middlesex and Somerset users apparently get most of their stuff in, or from, New York City, where supplies are increasing, officials said. The heroin flowing into New York is mainly coming from Lebanon, Turkey and Pakistan, they said.

Observers differed on the purity of heroin used in the area, but several described most of it as "garbage."

LOWER PURITY

Det. Thomas Maltese, head of Middlesex County's Narcotics Task Force, said purity is only 1 to 1.5 percent compared with "at least 4 percent" in 1970 to 1974. Heroin is always diluted many times in the distribution process to create larger quantities for sale.

Many users in both counties also combine heroin with cocaine, a practice called speedballing, officials said. Cocaine gives heroin users more energy—keeps them from "nodding off," they said.

The actor John Belushi, star of the movie "Animal House" and the TV show "Saturday Night Live," died in March 1982 from speedballing.

Another problem, which appears to be confined to New Brunswick, is the use of "hits," a combination of codeine and doriden to produce a heroin-like high, officials said.

In 1980 and 1981, 45 people died of hits overdoses in the state, compared with 143 heroin overdose deaths, French said. Seven of the deaths overlapped and involved both heroin and hits, he said, and 70 percent of the heroin overdose victims also had alcohol in their systems.

Several New Brunswick residents have died of hits overdoses in the past few years. Maltese said he can't recall many heroin overdoses in Middlesex in recent years.

Somerset's heroin problem became apparent last week with six arrests in Franklin and New Brunswick, revealing a large distribution operation.

The ring had allegedly been operating for about a year in Franklin and three or four months in New Brunswick, according to officials. Drug deliveries were made about twice a week from New York to Franklin, they said.

"I could say there was a large number of people buying the drugs" from five or six "mules"—people who sold heroin to street users for a dealer who would not touch the contraband, said Detective Richard Thornburg, chief of detectives.

AVAILABILITY, USE UP

He estimated that perhaps 100 people were buying the heroin in Franklin and New Brunswick.

Buchinksi said it appears that "a good many" of Somerset users in general are unemployed and poor, although "children or higher income people are also involved."

He said users were generally in their early to mid-20s, with "quite a few people in their 30s." The recent increased availability in heroin has a lot to do with the increased use, he added.

Richard Coles, director of the Somerset County Drug Abuse Clinic in Somerville, said the average age of addicts who seek treatment at the Somerset clinic at Somerset Medical Center is 23, he said.

They come to the clinic to get off heroin and go on methadone, an addictive drug with a weaker narcotic effect than heroin. It allows people to function normally and hold jobs.

The clinic has a detoxification program and 65 people on methadone on an outpatient basis, up from 40 to 43 three or four years ago, Coles said.

Methadone maintenance is "a last resort kind of process" with the goal of keeping a person from going to jail and committing crimes, he said. "I know it's an extremely controversial subject" he added.

Denis Mansmann, executive director of the Perth Amboy Addiction Center, which also offers methadone programs, said addicts become as psychologically addicted to methadone as heroin.

Describing the thinking of addicts, he said: "I got a problem, take a drug. I got a drug problem, take a drug. They're very, very afraid to come off (methadone)."

The former heroin addicts using the Somerset clinic include students and homemakers, white and black males and females, Coles said. Many "graduated" from pills such as Valium, Librium, Quaaludes and amphetamines (speed), he added.

"Supplies are increasing. The profit motive keeps it turning. Immense kinds of profits can be made," he said.

"It's spreading like wildfire," even in suburban and rural communities, Coles said, "The thing is like a terrible cancer in a community."

Maltese of Middlesex's Narcotics Task Force said no known organized heroin distribution groups are based in Middlesex and that heroin use appears to be on a downswing.

Heroin usage is down in Perth Amboy and staying at about the same level in New Brunswick, the two Middlesex cities with the highest concentrations of users, law enforcement officials said.

Business is booming at the New Brunswick Counseling Center, which has methadone detoxification and maintenance clinics in New Brunswick and Plainfield, Guadagnino said.

About 130 are in the Plainfield maintenance program, up from 60 two years ago, while 140 to 150 are in the New Brunswick program, up from 55 two years ago, he said.

CLIENTS PAY SHARE

Clients pay a share of the costs because of increasing operating costs and dwindling state and federal dollars, he said, noting that services were free two years ago.

Guadagnino said he's seen "a great increase" in heroin use among white middle-class people in the New Brunswick area in the past three or four years. They can be found in East Brunswick, Highland Park, Edison and other towns, he said.

Detective Paul Schuster, one of four men assigned to narcotics investigations in New Brunswick, said probably several hundred users live in the city.

Schuster said heroin addicts are thought to be responsible for many of the burglaries, robberies and thefts in the city.

"It's very easy to get rid of stolen stuff," said Schuster. "A lot goes right to New York."

Meanwhile, 55 people are on methadone maintenance at the Perth Amboy Addiction Center, said Mansmann, up from 15 a decade ago.

The recent Perth Amboy "war on drugs was very, very effective," he said. "We saw the result of that. The word was out on the street to either clean up or you're going to jail."

Only about 40 addicts remain in Perth Amboy, down from several hundred in late 1981, when the crackdown started, Polaka said.

CHAIRMAN'S NOTIFICATION TO THE SENATE OF A CROSSWALK CHANGE FOR THE RESERVE FUND

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, pursuant to section 2(c) of the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1984 (H. Con. Res. 91), I hereby report to the Senate on behalf of the Committee on the Budget an adjusted allocation to the Committee on Finance under section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act. The details of this adjustment are contained in the following letter from the Committee on the Budget to the Committee on Finance.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, D.C., September 28, 1983.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Chairman, Committee on Finance, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is to advise you of an adjustment in the spending totals allocated to your Committee under the First Budget Resolution for fiscal year 1984 (H. Con. Res. 91). This adjustment is made pursuant to section 2(c) of the First Budget Resolution dealing with reserve programs.

In accordance with section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act, the budget authority and outlay totals in the First Budget Resolution were allocated among the committees of the Senate. These allocations, contained in the statement of managers accompanying the conference report on the First Budget Resolution, excluded amounts set aside in a budget reserve for identified new initiatives in domestic programs.

Section 2(c) of the First Budget Resolution provides that the amounts in the budget reserve are to be allocated to the appropriate committees of the Senate upon enactment of authorizing legislation or at the point the Senate proceeds to consider entitlement or other direct spending legislation. The programs in the budget reserve and the amounts in the reserve fund for each program are set forth in the statement of managers accompanying the conference report on the First Budget Resolution.

Your Committee has reported and the Senate will shortly proceed to consider S. 1887, a bill that includes an extension of federal supplemental compensation benefits for the unemployed, one of the programs contained in the budget reserve. Accordingly, the section 302(a) allocation to your Committee under the First Budget Resolution is hereby adjusted as follows:

[Dollars in millions]

	Fiscal year 1983		Fiscal year 1984
	BA	O	BA	O
Direct spending jurisdiction:
Original committee allocation [1]	$409,060	$389,550	$426,162	$412,088
Adjustment for Federal supplemental compensation benefits for the unemployed			1,500	1,500
Adjusted committee allocation	409,060	389,550	427,662	413,588
Entitlements funded in annual appropriation acts:
Original committee allocation	50,408	56,303	52,863	52,929
Adjustment for Federal supplemental compensation benefits for the unemployed			1,500	1,500
Adjusted committee allocation	50,408	56,303	54,363	54,429

[1] Includes technical corrections transmitted to the committee on July 19, 1983.

The adjustment for the Federal supplemental compensation program reflects the amount for that program in the reserve fund.

Sincerely,

PETE V. DOMENICI,
Chairman.

H.R. 3263, THE MILITARY CONSTRUCTION APPROPRIATION CONFERENCE AGREEMENT

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, last night, the Senate passed the fiscal year 1984 military construction appropriation bill conference agreement.

I would like to commend my distinguished colleague, Senator MATTINGLY, and the members of the military construction conference for the work they did to produce the agreement.

The conference agreement on H.R. 3263 provides $7.1 billion in budget authority and $2.3 billion in outlays for fiscal year 1984.

With outlays from prior-year budget authority and other actions completed—including the jobs bill—the Military Construction Subcommittee is $0.2 billion below its 302(b) allocation in budget authority and right on its 302(b) allocaton in outlays.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table showing the relationship of the conference agreement to the congressional spending budget and the President's request be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILITARY CONSTRUCTION SUBCOMMITTEE—SPENDING TOTALS—CONFERENCE AGREEMENT

[In billions of dollars]

	Fiscal year 1984

EXTENSION OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILE IMPORT RESTRAINTS

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, 3 years ago, Japan agreed to a 2-year program of so-called voluntary restraints on it automobile exports to the United States.

I say "voluntary" restraints with some irony, because this arrangement was agreed to under considerable pressure from U.S. negotiators and under the real threat that Congress would otherwise enact more drastic retrictions. Had the Japanese restraints been other than voluntary, of course, U.S. efforts would have been in violation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

At the end of the 2 years, Japan agreed to an extension of an additional year. Now, months before the current extension expires, U.S. pressure is already intensifying for yet another extension—a 4th year.

Japanese International Trade and Industry Minister Uno's remarks several weeks ago that Japan might not extend its restraints precipitated an avalanche of protests from Members of Congress along with threats of import quotas and domestic content legislation. I understand there have been scores of letters from Members of Congress to the administration and Japanese officials and with them an abundance of hyperbolic rhetoric. One Senator scaled the oratorical heights when he declared that this "Japanese attack" was "another Pearl Harbor." Voluntary restraints, first sought as a temporary respite, are apparently now pursued as a renewable matter of right.

In my view, Mr. President, the Japanese are correct to question the expectation of perpetual protection for the American auto industry, especially in view of its dramatic recovery in recent months. It is my hope the Japanese will resist the pressure to renew the agreement, for the sake of our own dedication to free trade, for the sake of the American consumer, and for the sake of the American auto industry itself.

Let us take a look at what all the shouting is about. Between 1970 and 1980, U.S. imports of Japanese passenger cars rose from 381,338 to 1,991,503; Japanese imports captured 21.3 percent of the U.S. market. The popularity of the Japanese cars, Mr. President, is what the shouting is about.

The Japanese manufacturers were producing attractive, efficient, reasonably priced cars, and the Americans were buying them. Indeed, while American management sat back complacently planning more big cars with built-in obsolescence, the Japanese were turning out smaller, more reliable, more fuel-efficient cars, suited to the new reality of high-cost fuel. While American auto unions were demanding still higher wages for workers—who have been earning 50 percent more than the average U.S. manufacturing wage earner—Japanese auto workers were turning out cars at a rate of productivity almost two-and-a-half times that of their American counterparts.

Although one might never know it from the rhetoric surrounding this issue, there was nothing unfair about the market penetration of Japanese cars. The Japanese automakers were not benefiting from government subsidies. They were not dumping their cars below cost. They were simply offering a product that was responsive to changing consumer preferences. In fact, in 1980, when the industry applied to the International Trade Commission for protection from Japanese competition, the ITC denied relief. Competition fair and square.

Nonetheless, contending that they needed time to retool, the American auto industry succeeded in generating sufficient political support to win 3 years of import protection.

In its July 27 editorial entitled, "Ready or Not, Let Cars Compete," the New York Times said it aptly:

> Their (the automobile industry's) case could never bear much examination. More capital, effective management and union cooperation were critical requirements—not protectionism. And in any event, it was never clear why consumers should bear the burden of this adjustment while stockholders cotinued to receive dividends and workers continued to receive 50 percent more in wages than other manufacturing workers. The United States should never have forced restraints on the Japanese as long as American companies and their workers were unwilling to make comparably significant concessions.

Regardless of the justification for import restrictions, the domestic industry did make use of the time. Undoubtedly, the threat that export restraints might not be renewed induced real improvements. U.S. automakers have invested over $43 billion since 1979 in introducing new fuel-efficient cars, in modernizing their plants, and in improving efficiency. At the same time, the industry's recent efforts also show just how indulgent it had become and just how much room there has been for improvement. For example, U.S. automakers have cut overhead to the point where their break-even point is, by some reports, 50 percent below prerecession levels. I would say a Japanese Diet certainly had some healthful effects on that kind of fat.

Labor, too, has touted its quality and productivity reforms. At a newly reopened General Motors plant in Framingham, Mass., absenteeism exceeding 20 percent over a 6-month period will now be penalized. One wonders what was tolerated before such "reforms."

American-made cars are now selling at an annual adjusted rate of 7 million, compared to last year's actual total of 5.8 million. General Motors made a profit of $1 billion in the second quarter of this year, Ford made $542 million, and Chrysler made $310 million. Domestic car production in August was up 37 percent over last August—the best August since 1978. Laid off workers are returning to the job, and manufacturers now have the small car capacity and the resources they said they needed to compete. All estimates point to sustained growth.

No productive purpose can be served by further shielding the industry from Japanese competition. I note the United Auto Workers have already seized upon the domestic auto prosperity as an opportunity to return to business-as-usual—an invitation to seek further wage increases. And 5 months before expiration of its union contract, Chrysler has acceded to a $1 billion package, increasing salary and benefits 25 percent over 2 years. By October 1985, Chrysler workers will earn $26 an hour in wages and benefits.

Although one Senator reacted to the possibility of an end to import restrictions by blasting the Japanese as being "narrow and selfish," in my view it is the American auto industry—management and labor—that is selfish, indeed greedy, not the Japanese.

It is the American industry that wants a government sanctioned shield from legitimate competition—so manufacturers can keep as much as possible of the revived automobile market to themselves, so that labor might press for still more increases, and so that the consumer will be left to bear the burden through higher prices and restricted choice.

U.S. Trade Representative Brock recently told the Joint Economic Committee that the UAW's renewed push for wage increases is inconsistent with U.S. demands for further Japanese restraints. While the simultaneous demands might make negotiations more difficult, I submit there is really nothing inconsistent about them. To the contrary, it is restraints that make higher wage demands possible. If forced to operate in a competitive marketplace, the UAW would find it much harder to get away with the excesses it demands, and management could never afford its characteristic aquiescence.

Well, Mr. President, I cannot countenance telling the people in Rhode Island, where the average wage earner makes $9 an hour, that they cannot buy the Japanese automobile they may prefer so that $22.50-an-hour, soon-to-be $26-an-hour, autoworkers can get another raise.

Make no mistake, it is the consumer who truly bears the burden of auto import restraints. It is the consumer who, if he seeks a U.S.-made car, pays for the excesses and inefficiencies quotas allow. And it is the consumer who, if he seeks a Japanese-made automobile, is hurt by the limited selection and premium prices quotas mandate.

Let me say a few words about the effect of quotas on the sale of Japanese cars in the United States.

As is their intended effect, the quotas have put Japanese-made cars in very short supply. Consumers often must look hard and wait long to purchase Japanese-made cars. The smaller economy models are especially difficult to find, as manufacturers understandably prefer to fill their quota with the more expensive, and profitable models. Beyond this, consumers are often forced to swallow an additional $1,000 to $2,000 premium above list price that dealers impose to offset the quota-reduced volume.

Truly, it is the consumer who pays—and a very hefty price it is—for auto industry protection.

Now there is one argument made by spokesmen for the industry that I would like specifically to refute. That is the argument that restraints are necessary because of the overvaluation of the dollar vis-a-vis the yen.

I agree that the dollar is too highly valued, and I also agree that this has hurt American exports and helped imports. But this problem is one which all U.S. industries face. Singling out one industry for special relief for this reason is certainly not the answer to the problem. The correct answer is to control budget deficits which do so much to keep U.S. interest rates high, leading to an over-valued dollar.

This administration, which has prided itself on an open-trade policy, has in recent months given in to political pressures for protections in a number of areas where I think protection was inappropriate. But at least in such cases as Japanese motorcycles and foreign specialty steel imports, there was the agrument that the domestic industries needed time to get back on their feet.

In the case of automobiles, the industry has had that time and by all accounts is firmly back on its feet. If protection was justified before, more protection will be counterproductive now. Competition from the Japanese has induced improvements in the American auto industry. The assurance of perpetual restraints will erode these improvements. By shielding the American auto industry from competition, we encourage the very practices that make the need for further protection an annually self-fulfilling prophecy.

Mr. President, while import restrictions may provide the protected industry a "free ride," protectionism is not without heavy cost. It comes at the expense of not only our trading partners, but also our trade relations and credibility as a free trading nation. More concretely, it comes at the real expense of the American consumer.

We have a good many legitimate concerns about Japanese trade policies and practices. But their auto exports are not among them. These exports represent fair and salutary competition. They have provided the American consumer with a choice and have shaken our own industry from its torpor, resulting in a better American car as well.

Let us not dissipate our energies and our trading partners' good will over the narrow interests of a now-healthy industry.

I urge the administration to resist the pressure for renewed auto import protection, and I pledge to fight such proposals in Congress.

FEEDING EVERYBODY—HOW FEDERAL FOOD PROGRAM GREW AND GREW

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, an interesting article recently appeared in the fall 1983 issue of Policy Review entitled "Feeding Everybody—How Federal Food Program Grew and Grew," by James Bovard.

According to the author:

This is the story of how a handful of isolated incidents became justification for vastly increasing dependency in America; how a trivial number of examples stampeded Congress into a sweeping expansion of the welfare state; how congressmen repeatedly exaggerated the extent of hunger in order to justify trying to feed everybody; and how government, even though it increased spending twentyfold, still could not achieve its original goals. This is also the story of government at loggerheads, as one program spends $18 billion a year to subsidize diets while other programs and regulations do everything possible to raise food prices, in effect preventing the poor from getting adequate nutrition as cheaply as possible.

As a cosponsor of legislation to reign in the soaring costs of the food stamp program alone, a program which by itself costs every taxpayer in this country about $127.66, I was very interested to see that until 1980, Congress was still recruiting for participation in this program, in spite of the fact that for almost every targeted group there was already a special Federal program designed to help poor people feed themselves.

Mr. Bovard points out that: "the great myth underlying the growth of food assistance is that nutrition is largely dependent on income." Yet study after study has concluded that for the most part there is no correlation between income and nutrition. The author concludes with the observation that:

Despite a thirtyfold increase in food aid for the poor since 1955, there has been little or no improvement in their diets. Food programs have wasted billions, lured millions onto the dole, and perpetrated the myth that a low income is automatically debilitating.

Mr. President, this article should persuade all of us that there is ample room to properly care for the poor without bankrupting the Nation's taxpayers. I urge the support of my colleagues for reforming legislation, and recommend this article to all of them. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD in its entirety.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEEDING EVERYBODY—HOW FEDERAL FOOD PROGRAMS GREW AND GREW

(By James Bovard)

It was 1967. In the previous five years, the number of people receiving food stamps or surplus commodities had declined by 38 percent, the number of poor had declined by almost 30 percent, the economy was booming, and incomes were rising 2 or 3 percent per year. But the Great Society was floundering: Liberals took a beating in the 1966 congressional races, urban riots were eroding middle-class guilt, and Vietnam was beginning to overshadow domestic events. The War on Poverty, begun with such fanfare in 1964, was petering out, and the liberal agenda appeared out of gas.

And then hunger was discovered.

This is the story of how a handful of isolated incidents became justification for vastly increasing dependency in America; how a trivial number of examples stampeded Congress into a sweeping expansion of the welfare state; how congressmen repeatedly exaggerated the extent of hunger in order to justify trying to feed everybody; and how government, even though it increased spending twentyfold, still could not achieve its original goals. This is also the story of government at loggerheads, as one program spends $18 billion a year to subsidize diets while other programs and regulations do everything possible to raise food prices, in effect preventing the poor from getting adequate nutrition as cheaply as possible.

Congress first vastly overestimated the amount of poverty-related hunger, then set food assistance eligibility levels far above the poverty line, and then insisted that anyone eligible for food aid would go hungry unless government fed them. From the late 1960s to 1980, Congress continually expanded eligibility, redoubled benefits, and ordered campaign after campaign to recruit people for the dole. Yet the federal government today knows almost as little about the extent and causes of malnutrition as it did in 1967.

The history of food assistance programs since the late 1960s marks an important change in the American welfare state, from self-sufficiency as an honor and a right to government exhortations that people accept handouts and relinquish their pride. The expansion of food assistance is as much a revolution of principle as of policy.

Now one knows the total number of people government is feeding today. Federal food programs have roughly 70 million enrollees—more than quadruple the 1960 enrollment of 16 million. Families can simultaneously participate in seven food programs, and many get more from the government than self-supporting families spend on their food.

Now that the federal government has entered the "feed everybody" business, as one group after another has become eligible to eat at everyone else's expense, government takes responsibility for feeding people under 20 and over 60 regardless of their or their family's income. The cutoff income for federal food assistance for a family of four ($18,315) is now close to the median annual income for a full-time, year-round worker ($16,955 in 1981). Forty-five percent of pregnant women and infants in America are eligible for food handouts.

BAD PRECEDENT

From 1939 to 1943 the U.S. Department of Agriculture distributed food stamps to 13 million people, largely to help dispose of agricultural surpluses. The original food stamp program was chock-full of fraud and abuse; the USDA estimated that 25 percent of all coupons were abused, and the program was discontinued.

For some years afterward, the poor somehow managed to feed themselves. A 1955 USDA dietary survey found that only 25 percent of America's roughly 43 million poor had bad diets—diets containing less than two thirds of the recommended daily allowance for essential nutrients. Seventy-five percent of the poor provided themselves with adequate diets even though only a third were on public assistance.[1]

Nevertheless, in 1958 sixteen bills were introduced in Congress to bring back food stamps. At 1958 House Agriculture Committee hearings, during the worst recession since World War II, Representative Victor Anfuso (D.-New York), apparently going for the headlines, declared, "* * * ten million people in the United States * * * have inadequate incomes to buy the food they need * * *"[2] Representative George McGovern urged a food stamp program to provide benefits to 7 million or 8 million poor folk. There was no feeling among the committee or witnesses that tens of millions of Americans needed free or subsidized food. And it was not surprising that some of the poor were having trouble buying food, since the USDA was spending more than $2 billion a year to drive up food prices through price supports, acreage allotments, cropland set-asides, and the Food for Peace program to dump surplus commodities overseas.

In 1961 President Kennedy's first executive order initiated pilot food stamp programs in West Virginia and other states. Kennedy also doubled the number of surplus commodities that government distributed to the poor; enrollment in this program jumped to 6.4 million.

Kennedy's pilot food stamp program was tightly run, included nutritional education, and required participants to buy stamps at an average of 60 percent of face value, depending on family income. When counties converted from surplus commodity distribution to food stamps, many families dropped out because they were afraid the USDA would check their incomes too closely, or because the program was no longer worth their while. In St. Louis, for example, a person simply had to declare himself needy to be eligible for free commodities.[3] A 1967 General Accounting Office report found that between 30 and 40 percent of participants in the commodity distribution program had incomes exceeding program-eligibility limits.[4] Also, many families did not want to tie up their money in food stamps even though the stamps paid on the average a 66 percent bonus over cash costs; that is, for $6 one could receive $10 worth of stamps.

There was a widespread consensus that the limited federal food assistance programs had alleviated what little severe hunger existed. Michael Harrington, the self-proclaimed socialist whose book The Other America did more than anything else to make poverty a public issue again, wrote in 1962, "To be sure, the Other America is not impoverished in the same sense as those poor nations where millions cling to hunger as a defense against starvation. This country has escaped such extremes." Harrington's book openly sought to inflame public opinion, but even he would not contend that America's poor were hungry.

From 1963 to 1966 the New York Times did not run a single article on hunger in America. President Johnson sought to raise his sagging political fortunes in 1966 by declaring a war on hunger, but he was concerned solely with foreign hunger, and his campaign appeared to be largely intended both to justify dumping our agricultural surpluses on the world market and to distract attention from Vietnam. In a March 1967 Look magazine article, Senator George McGovern declared, "We are losing the race against hunger," but the article dealt with world hunger and did not even mention hunger in America.

Then, in April 1967, Senator Robert Kennedy and the Senate Subcommittee on Employment, Manpower, and Poverty held hearings on the War on Poverty in Mississippi. At the time, 20 percent of Mississippians were already receiving surplus commodities or food stamps. Kennedy found examples of acute poverty and malnutrition. The Field Foundation, a nonprofit organization concerned with poverty and race relations, quickly sent a team of physicians to examine 600 children in the Mississippi Delta, and they found sufficient suffering to justify a wholesale expansion in government aid.

Now it happens that in 1967 there probably were many hungry people in the Mississippi Delta—largely because of the federal government. Most blacks there worked on cotton plantations. Wages were low, but so was the cost of living. But in 1966 agricultural labor fell under the benevolent protection of the minimum wage, which made it more attractive for many planters to harvest their crops mechanically. The USDA estimated that the expansion of the minimum wage left 40,000 to 60,000 people in the Delta with little or no cash income.[5] To ice the cake, the USDA sharply increased cotton set-aside payments, thus idling once-busy fields. Field Foundation physicians found many families with zero income who could not afford to pay $2 per person to get $12 worth of food stamps. Congress first wrecked the local labor economy and then was shocked that men without jobs had trouble feeding their families.

The hunger issue was heating up, but it needed more credibility to play in Peoria. The Citizens Crusade against Poverty sponsored the Citizens Board of Inquiry into Hunger and Malnutrition in the United States. The chairman of the crusade was Walter Reuther, head of the United Auto Workers. The board rounded up a handful of doctors, held hearings in Alabama, Texas, South Carolina, and Kentucky, and issued a report in April 1968 entitled "Hunger U.S.A." The report was largely anecdotal, including a picture of a scrawny dog with the caption, "Where you see a starving dog such as this one, you'll find hungry people." The report concluded with a shot-in-the-dark estimate that there were "10 million or more" Americans who could not afford adequate diets. The report offered few facts or statistics to back up its estimate. It listed 256 "hunger counties" in the United States, chosen solely on the basis of statistical data on infant mortality rates and the number of poor on the dole and food assistance programs.

A WAY OF LIFE

The Citizens Board report was the basis of a CBS documentary in May 1968, which found a few people who said they were going hungry because government would not feed them and concluded by denouncing our callous society. Dr. Raymond Wheeler of the Citizens Board announced, "Slow starvation has become part of the Southern way of life." Together, the board report and the CBS documentary made hunger a national issue.

More than any other single document, the board report was responsible for the food assistance explosion. It is surprising that the report was so respected. It used infant mortality figures from 1951 to 1960 even though statistics for 1965 were available. It contrasted the number of poor in 1960 with the number getting food assistance in 1967 even though the number of poor had declined by 12 million in the interim.[6] In 1968 House hearings Dr. Leslie Dunbar, cochairman of the board, said that only about half of the "hunger counties" had food assistance programs; in fact 194 of 256 did. Under questioning, board physicians admitted that their estimates were hypothetical and defended numerous inaccuracies and mistakes by saying that the report was a rush job and that the important thing was for Congress to act immediately. Much of the suffering the board attributed to malnutrition due to hunger was actually due to parasites.

Nationwide, many localities were amazed to find themselves designated hunger counties. The Milwaukee Journal on May 25, 1968, after investigating reports that Sawyer County, Wisconsin, was a hunger county, concluded, "In talks with a variety of residents, no one could be found who believes this to be true." The chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, Robert Poage, wrote to health officers in each of the 256 so-called hunger counties, and almost all responded by reporting little or no known hunger or malnutrition due to poverty. Even under the guidance of Secretary Orville Freeman, a New Deal liberal, the USDA in 1967 contended that only 6.7 million of the poor—not 10 million, as estimated by the Citizens Board—had bad diets or would have had bad diets in the absence of food programs.

The board's reasoning was epitomized by a statement by Dr. Dunbar. After observing that only 18 percent of the nation's 30 million poor were getting federal food handouts, Dr. Dunbar concluded, "We cannot assume that any of the remaining poor—those on neither program [food stamps or commodity distribution]—are getting food." [7] This little gem of logic became the guiding light for food assistance for the next decade.

But what was the dietary status of the poor in the mid-sixties? In February 1968 the USDA released results of its 1965 dietary survey, showing that 64 percent of the poor had good or adequate diets. The number of poor with bad diets increased from 25 percent in 1955 to 36 percent in 1965 despite sharp increases in public assistance enrollments. The two nutrients in which the poor were the most deficient were vitamin C, supplied by fresh fruits and vegetables, and calcium, supplied by milk. The New York Times reported on March 27, 1968, that the "downturn in nutritional value was attributable largely to a national turning away from milk and milk products, fruits and vegetables."

And why should that have occurred? USDA marketing orders kept the price of fruits and vegetables high, and price supports helped inflate the cost of milk. In fact, the same year that the dietary survey showed that 36 percent of the poor had calcium deficencies, the USDA effectively ended the sale of reconstituted milk. Dairies had previously mixed milk powder, butterfat, and water to produce a drink that tasted like milk but cost 20 percent less because of savings in transport costs. But the USDA decreed that reconstituted milk could not be sold for less than the price of whole fluid milk, a regulation intended solely to protect dairy farmers' income and help reelect Wisconsin congressmen.

So, instead of modifying policies that artificially increased the price of nutritious foods, the government accelerated its across-the-board feeding approach. On May 6, 1969, President Richard Nixon declared, "That hunger and malnutrition should persist in a land such as ours is embarrassing and intolerable . . . The moment is at hand to put an end to hunger in America itself for all time." The programs that had remained manageable under the Johnson administration—food stamps, school lunch subsidies, and others—went into orbit during the Nixon years. President Nixon sponsored a White House conference on food and nutrition, which urged the President to declare a national emergency and give food stamps to anyone who said he needed them. In 1970 and 1971 food stamp eligibility was expanded; in 1973 legislation was passed mandating that every jurisdiction in the United States offer food stamps by June 1974.

SWALLOWING PRIDE

Even though food stamp enrollment quadrupled between 1968 and 1971, Congress mandated an outreach program for states to recruit people for food stamps. A USDA magazine reported that food stamp workers could often overcome people's pride by saying, " 'This is for your children' * * * the problem is not with welfare recipients but with low-income workers: It is this group which recoils when anything even remotely resembling welfare is suggested." By early 1972 the magazine could announce, "With careful explanations * * * coupled with intensive outreach efforts, resistance from the 'too prouds' is bending. More and more are coming to the conclusion that taking needed assistance does not mean sacrificing dignity." [8] But according to USDA surveys, most of the poor did not need federal aid to have an adequate diet.

In March 1972 President Nixon announced Project FIND to locate and recruit 3 million elderly poor for food assistance. Despite mass mailing of information to almost 30 million retirees, and despite home visits and telephone campaigns by 36,000 Red Cross volunteers, only 190,000 elderly signed up. The GAO found that in most countries surveyed, recruiting efforts enticed fewer than 3 percent of the elderly poor onto the food dole.[9] Apparently, many felt that despite having been labeled poor by some bureaucrat, they could feed themselves.

In 1973 the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Hunger Needs, chaired by George McGovern, released Hunger 1973, a report intended as "a profile of the half-full, half-empty plate which the federal food programs represent to the nation's poor * * * after reaching the halfway mark * * *." The report observed, "Whether the real poverty count is 25, 26, or even 30 million persons, the fact that only 15 million of the poor participate in any food assistance program * * * indicates that the hunger gap is far from closed either for the country or the individuals concerned." The New Republic editorialized "* * * almost half (48%) of the poor still do not receive adequate food * * * 12.7 million people who ought to be getting either food stamps or commodities have not been." [10] The Senate Select Committee published a list of "failure to feed" counties in which fewer than a third of the poor were on food doles. This sufficed for evidence of the committee's claims of widespread hunger.

In five years the definition of hunger changed from insufficient food to low income and no federal food handout. Even though the USDA reported that almost two thirds of the poor did not have bad diets, congressmen insisted that any poor person not being fed by the government must be hungry and malnourished. A radical change occurred in the concept of the poor. No longer people who occasionally needed a helping hand, they became a social class by definition incapable of feeding itself. The fixation on food program enrollments is even more surprising, considering that many of the poor not enrolled were receiving some other kind of public assistance intended to help cover food costs, such as Aid to Families with Dependent Children.

In 1974 the Senate Select Committee held a conference to rescue the hunger issue from oblivion. Conference participants agreed that despite a fourfold increase in federal food aid since 1968, "we have moved backwards in our struggle to end hunger, poverty, and malnutrition." The New York Times gave the conference a front-page headline: "U.S. Needy Found Poorer, Hungrier than Four Years Ago." [11] Even though food stamp enrollment had zoomed from 3 million to 16 million and the number of poor was roughly the same, things had somehow worsened. As usual, the evidence was anecdotal, with no nationwide survey to back up claims.

In 1974 the Food Research and Action Center, a federally funded lobby, successfully sued USDA to require the agency to increase its food stamp outreach efforts. The USDA suggested sending food stamp workers to unemployment offices to distribute leaflets, and in Pennsylvania food stamp aides went to supermarkets to hustle shoppers. By 1976 twelve states had conducted door-to-door recruiting campaigns, and seventeen had conducted telephone campaigns. Door-to-door food stamp advertising became a favorite project for Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA) workers.

In Wisconsin 2,000 copies of the Food Stamp Nursery Rhyme Coloring Book were distributed. In Kentucky a traveling puppet show told folks how and why to sign up for benefits. The USDA enlisted Dustin Hoffman, Joyce Brothers, Count Basie, and other notables to do promotional radio spots for good stamps and the national school lunch program.

GRILLED STEAKS

A typical 1975 USDA brochure announced, "You are in good company. Millions of Americans use food stamps." A leaflet distributed in Maryland and paid for by the federal government showed a gaunt face on the cover with the question, "Did you know some people would rather starve than seek help * * *" On the inside, the brochure said, "pride never fills empty stomachs * * * Are you one of thousands of Maryland residents who * * * have too much pride to consider applying for help? Then you need to know more about the Food Stamp program. Food Stamps should not be confused with charity! In fact, food stamps are designed to help you help yourself."

The Community Services Administration funded scores of local and national food stamp advocate organizations to increase enrollment in food programs. The Office of Economic Opportunity called in 1971 for community action agencies to "prick the public conscience" over the need for more food handouts, declaring, "* * * food stamps are not used as often as they ought to be, particularly by the intermediate income families among the poor." [12] Total funding for food advocacy organizations probably exceeded $100 million in the 1970s.

In 1975, when food stamp enrollment neared 20 million, public outcries over food stamp recipients who drove Cadillacs and grilled steaks broke the political sound barrier. A full-page ad in Parade magazine offered a booklet telling how people earning $16,000 a year could qualify for food stamps. The General Accounting Office reported in 1975 that 18 percent of all food stamp benefits were fraudulent or excessive.[13] The Joint Economic Committee estimated that up to 73 million Americans were eligible, and a USDA assistant secretary said that under current rules, participation could rise to 110 million. The Ford administration tried to reduce benefits sharply for half the recipients, but Congress resisted.

RIDICULOUS STIGMAS

In 1977 the purchase requirement for food stamps was abolished, and the program became a straight handout. Congressional supporters did this explicitly to increase enrollment by 3 million; the Congressional Budget Office estimated that the change would add up to $2.7 billion a year to food stamp costs. In 1977 the head of USDA's Food and Nutrition Service declared—

I'm aware that there is a welfare stigma for people who use food stamps, but it's ridiculous . . . It is, in fact, far more desirable that people meet their nutrition needs with food stamps than that they drive their cars over federally financed roads.[14]

In 1979 USDA Assistant Secretary Carol Tucker Foreman complained, "There are areas of the country and particular age groups in which participation levels are outrageously low." [15] The USDA continued trying to round up and enlist anyone who chanced to fall under eligibility guidelines. Also in 1979, Congress expanded enrollment by broadening eligibility and allowing additional deductions for medical and shelter expenses.

Between 1977-78 and 1979-80, the poor suffered another significant reduction in their calcium intakes—by an average of nearly a cup of milk per week. Calcium was already the most widely deficient nutrient among the poor in 1977, but that did not deter Congress from increasing the dairy support price from 75 to 80 percent of parity in 1977, nor did it deter President Carter from further increasing the support price on the eve of the 1980 election. Almost 40 percent of the poor do not get sufficient calcium in their diets.

Under pressure from the Reagan administration, Congress in 1981 and 1982 sought to reduce food stamp expenditures, tighten eligibility, and cut fraud. But the food stamp program will cost $1.6 billion more in fiscal year 1983 than in fiscal year 1981. Enrollment has surged from 20.6 million to 22 million, and the average monthly benefit has increased from $39.49 to $42.67. Food assistance spending has increased 34 percent since 1980 despite President Reagan's promises to cut back welfare spending.

We now have thirteen food assistance programs, including ten for children. Among them:

The Summer Feeding Program, begun in 1967, now feeds 3 million youngsters each summer. There are no income eligibility limits for this program: As long as a child lives in or visits a low-income neighborhood with a feeding site, he can have a free lunch. In 1977 the GAO reported that since centers were reimbursed by the meal, some were serving the same children five times a day. Nationwide, fraud and abuse were rampant: Contractors were collecting for nonexistent meals, adults were eating meals designated for children, and kickbacks were enriching the sponsoring organizations.[16]

The Child Care Food Program, begun in 1968, subsidizes food in day-care and other child-care centers. In 1978 Congress removed all income eligibility standards, and the program's cost quadrupled in the following four years. The GAO recently estimated that more than 70 percent of participants now come from families with incomes about 185 percent of the poverty line. The GAO also found that meals served at 62 percent of participant centers failed to meet USDA nutritional standards, and 20 percent of centers had unhealthy conditions, including vermin.[17]

The Supplemental Feeding Program for Women, Infants, and Children (WIC) provides food coupons for specific dairy, cereal, and infant formula items for pregnant mothers and children under 5 who are judged to be at "nutritional risk." The GAO reports that according to one survey of physicians, only 29 percent of WIC participants showed noticeable nutritional improvement from WIC foods, and 53 percent showed either no deficiency or no benefit.[18] The third most prevalent nutritional deficiency justifying free WIC food is obesity. Roughly 80 percent of WIC participants are already on food stamps.[19] The Commodity Supplemental Food Program serves the same clientele as WIC but provides food instead of coupons; in Washington, D.C., only about half the enrollees bother to pick up the free food.[20]

The Congregate Feeding for the Elderly, begun in 1966, provides free meals five times a week for citizens over 60, regardless of income, and for their mates, regardless of age. Along with Meals on Wheels, it fed 3 million elderly in 1982.

The School Breakfast Program serves breakfast to an average of 3 million children each school day. Congress thought that low-income families could not afford to feed their youngsters breakfast, even though 84 percent of participants come from families already eligible for food stamps. The federal government also pays 14 cents per breakfast for middle-class students who eat at school.

The National School Lunch Program serves 23 million children a day—9.9 million for free, 7 million at reduced prices, and 6 million who "pay" but still eat federally subsidized lunches. The federal subsidy per "paid" lunch amounted to $65 per middle-class child (from a family earning 185 percent of the poverty level) in fiscal 1981; the Reagan administration has since reduced the subsidy. George McGovern, Hubert Humphrey, and other liberals pushed hard in the early 1970s for a universal free lunch program, and in 1977 Congress authorized special subsidies to schools that provided free lunches for all children, regardless of income.

HUNGER HOAX

For fifteen years politicians have insisted that the main purpose of food programs is to fight hunger, and for fifteen years the programs' main effect has been to raise the incomes of tens of millions without appreciably affecting their nutrition. Liberals and the media have perpetrated a hunger hoax to justify sharply increasing the income of the welfare class.

Two thirds of the 8 million new food stamp recipients between 1968 and 1972 were public assistance recipients who were automatically added to the rolls, thanks to vigorous federal and local recruiting. Until 1977 public assistance recipients were automatically entitled to food stamps, regardless of their income. Food stamps were extended to public assistance recipients even though public assistance was already supposed to be covering or helping cover food costs. Charles Hobbs, Governor Reagan's welfare director, estimated, "In 1976 the welfare family of four received, on average, cash and in-kind benefits totalling $14,960—an amount slightly higher than the median family income in that year." [21]

Food stamps are also generally available to the unemployed, whether they quit work or were discharged. This is because the program calculates eligibility solely on present income: If a person quits a $50,000-a-year job and has few assets, he is eligible to receive food stamps the following month. The GAO estimated that 70 percent of food stamp errors stemmed from recipients' misreporting their incomes, and the USDA inspector general's office found that 30 percent of the recipients of free and reduced-price lunches were ineligible.

A 1983 GAO report found that food stamp fraud and abuse averaged a billion dollars a year. The report noted, "Officials in the states GAO visited said they had not tried to identify more overissuance cases because there have been no requirements and few financial incentives." [22] In 1980 and 1981, when roughly $2 billion in stamps was overissued through error and fraud, state governments managed to recover only $20 million—just 1 percent of the loss.[23] In Los Angeles and New York City, people who finagled excess benefits received a single letter telling them to pay money back; there was no followup. In Washington, D.C., where 15 percent of the population received food stamps and, according to the GAO, abuse was widespread, not a single person was prosecuted for fraud between 1978 and 1980. The GAO also reported that the federally funded Food Research and Action Committee "advised food stamp recipients that they did not have to make restitution for receiving too many benefits."[24] (FRAC received $150,000 from the federally funded Legal Services Corporation in 1982 and has been given $50,000 so far this year, money it is using to help people sue the USDA and bring class-action suits to block proposed cutback in nutrition spending.) In testimony before the Joint Economic Committee in May 1983, Office of Management and Budget Director David Stockman said, "In 1981, fully 42 percent of all dollars expended on low-income benefits went to households which, when that aid was included, had incomes above 150 percent of the poverty level."

Until 1981, strikers were allowed to get food stamps immediately after going on strike. In some places, such as the Illinois coal fields, special food stamp offices were set up to handle the rush after a major walkout. Students easily qualified for food stamps until 1980; a GAO study in 1975 found that 13 percent of the students at one university were on the dole.[25]

Many farmers complain that because of food stamps it is difficult to find people willing to help harvest crops. The San Juan Journal editorialized on August 22, 1975, that the food stamp program "is cultivating, encouraging, and abetting a generation of loafers in Puerto Rico." (Almost 60 percent of the island's residents were receiving food stamps.) Treasury Secretary William Simon in congressional testimony cited the views of the director of the Puerto Rico Manufacturers Association and the president of the Association of General Contractors, "who say some industries are in danger of shutting down operations because they cannot find workers. This is occurring in spite of the fact that unemployment on the island is 20 percent."[26] One 1975 study found that "recipients of food stamps with some wage income choose to work fewer hours when food stamps are available. The decrease in income from work is roughly equal to the subsidy so that the two cancel out and there is no net gain in income."[27]

The farcical work registration requirements are another example of how income redistribution masquerades as food stamps. The GAO reported in 1978 that of 620 able-bodied adult food stamp recipients required to register for work, only three actually got jobs.[28] Until 1981 the only penalty for refusing to work was suspension of benefits for thirty days. Thus someone could refuse a job and still get benefits every other month; his or her family was entitled to receive benefits even though the head of the household refused work. The USDA is known for being rough on its workers; the GAO noted, "Merely showing up at the worksite constituted compliance with the workfare obligation."[29] Federally funded legal service programs often sue local governments to stop food stamp work programs.

WHERE DOES THE MONEY GO?

Federal food programs largely replace food that people would have bought for themselves. A Congressional Budget Office study found that a dollar's worth of food stamps increased a family's food expenditure by only 57 cents; the other 43 cents simply replaced money the person would have spent on food anyway.[30] A recent study of Supplemental Security Income recipients whose food stamp allotments were cashed out found that each additional dollar of food stamp payments increased food purchases by only 14 cents.[31]

Despite a thirtyfold increase in federal spending for food assistance for the poor since 1955, there has been little or no major improvement in lower-income diets. As the table below shows, the average poor person in 1955 was already getting adequate nutrition. The poor's intake of essential nutrients in 1955 already exceeded the National Academy of Science's recommended daily allowance for 1980.

	1980 RDA	Average intake in lower income diets
		1955	1979–80
Vitamin A	5,000 I.U.	8,120 I.U.	8,391 I.U.
Thiamin	1.4 mg.	1.58 mg.	2.07 mg.
Riboflavin	1.6 mg.	2.21 mg.	2.62 mg.
Ascorbic acid	60 mg.	94 mg.	137 mg.
Calcium	800 mg.	1.11 g.	1.05 g.
Protein	56 g.	100 g.	101.9 g.
Niacin	16 mg.	17.1 mg.
Calories	2,700	3,180	2,897

The 1980 RDA is for males aged 23 to 50. The 1979–80 survey included other nutrients not surveyed in 1955.[32]

The Food and Nutrition Board of the National Academy of Science notes, "As there is no way of predicting whose needs are high and whose needs are low, RDA (except for energy) are estimated to exceed the requirements of most individuals, and thereby insure that the needs of nearly all are met."[33] And the USDA 1977–78 survey of low-income household diets concluded, "Food used both by households participating in the food stamp program and by those not participating was sufficient, on the average, to provide the 1974 RDA for food energy and the 11 nutrients studied."[34]

The 1979–80 study showed a sharp drop in the number of low-income households (both users and nonusers of food stamps) meeting the RDA for all nutrients and food energy—from 42 percent in 1977–78 to 39 percent in 1979–80.[35] This occurred despite a 3.6 million rise in food stamp enrollment, a 6.4 percent increase in the real value of the average food stamp benefits, and a 60 percent increase in federal monthly expenditures on food stamps (from $404 million to $642 million).

NUTRITIONALLY ADEQUATE

Further evidence of the irrelevance of food stamps to lower-income nutrition comes from a 1982 USDA study on food stamps and lower-income elderly:

After using regressional analysis to control for the effects of other variables, there were no statistically significant differences between program participants and eligible nonparticipants in the intakes of the nine nutrients studied.[36]

The 1979–80 survey of lower-income household diets revealed that the average low-income person eligible for but not using food stamps achieved the RDA for nine of thirteen nutrients; the average food stamp user met the RDA only for eight. Of those nutrients in which both groups were deficient, there was a significant difference between users and nonusers on only one—vitamin B_6 (food stamp users consumed 79 percent of the RDA, and nonusers 72 percent; nutritionists say that any diet with 70 percent of the RDA is adequate though not ideal). Nonusers had higher average intakes than food stamp users for three nutrients for which one or both groups fell short of the RDA (calcium iron, and magnesium).[37]

If federal food assistance was intended to fight hunger, then it was an abject failure, since the poor consume fewer calories now than in 1955. The decline in calorie consumption among the poor stems largely from decreased fat intake and is mainly a result of personal choice. If hunger was widespread among the poor today, they would buy more calorie-dense, fatty foods, and fewer fruits and vegetables. Scattered cases of individual hunger may exist, but it makes no sense to make 40 million people eligible for food stamps because of half a dozen families shown on the evening news.

If food stamps were necessary for the majority of the poor to feed themselves, then the poor who do not use food stamps would not eat as well as those who do. In fact, a 1967 USDA study showed little difference in the nutritional status of food stamp users and nonusers of similar income and background. A 1972 USDA Consumer Expenditure Diary Survey reported that food stamp households "spent approximately four times as much for nonalcoholic beverages (excluding fresh whole milk) than did non-food stamp households"—largely for soft drinks. Kenneth Clarkson observed in his 1975 book, Food Stamps and Nutrition, that food stamp recipients frequently buy more sweets and convenience or packaged foods instead of fresh fruits and vegetables and dairy products. The 1977–78 USDA survey of low-income household diets found that food stamp participants consumed more luncheon meats, sausages, soft drinks, cereals, and fruit punches than nonparticipants; low-income nonusers ate more eggs, tomatoes, dark-green vegetables, and grain mixtures.[38]

The National School Lunch Program receives $3 billion a year in federal money to provide one third of the recommended daily allowance for schoolchildren. But the GAO has repeatedly pointed out that the government's lunches do not even meet the government's standards. In 1977 the GAO noted, "The absence of any indication that the program is having a benefit upon the health of either needy or nonneedy children raises questions about the nutritional value of the lunch."[39] In 1978 the GAO reported that lab tests found that a random sample of school lunches "were significantly short in as many as 8 of the 13 nutrients tested . . . Separate tests in New York showed that at least 40% of the lunches did not meet USDA requirements as to quantities served."[40] In a 1981 followup, the GAO concluded, " . . . all types of lunches fell short of providing the recommended levels of many as 7 of the 14 nutrients tested, some to a serious extent."[41]

INEFFECTIVE

Nor has the school breakfast program proved its salt. The American Journal of Public Health reported in 1978 that only two studies of the school breakfast program had reported beneficial effects; five others had found no difference.[42]

The GAO's conclusion on WIC was that "reliable assessments of its overall results and benefits have not been made."[43] Dr. George Graham of Johns Hopkins University told the Senate Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry Committee in 1982 that ". . .

most of the apparent benefits of the WIC program are the result of its usefulness in increasing utilization of prenatal and pediatric health services by some groups who habitually do not make regular use of them."[44] Since families of four with incomes up to $18,318 are eligible, most participants either get food stamps already or can afford to feed themselves. And more than 81 percent of recipients share WIC food with the family, thus minimizing nutritional effect on the pregnant woman and young child.

While government is doling out free food worth billions, federal efforts at nutritional education have been a singular failure. The USDA spent millions of dollars a year on nutrition education between 1955 and 1965, when American diets sharply deteriorated. The GAO reported that conflicting federal regulations on food labeling contribute to consumer confusion on healthy eating habits and that "federal efforts to inform the public [about nutrition] are sometimes unduly complex, duplicative, and contradictory."[45] Instead of teaching people how to get their money's worth out of their food dollars, government tries to rain perpetual subsidies upon them with the vague hope that they will eat better.

A recent New York Times editorial, entitled "Poorer, Hungrier," cited a list of statistics on infant mortality, short-statured 4-year-olds, and declining school lunch enrollment. The editorial naturally concluded, "Given what's happening to the hungry in America, this administration has cause only for shame."[46]

For a decade and a half, food politics has been dictated by fear of shame—by the dread that somewhere, somehow, some journalist will find a child with a bloated stomach and provoke another national uproar. Liberals still have close to no understanding of how programs actually work. The Times castigated President Reagan for wanting to trim the Child Care Food Program by over 25 percent. Yet over 70 percent of the benefits go to families with incomes above 185 percent of the poverty line. The Times says of WIC, "Nine million needy women and children are eligible for the program"—as always, eligibility in itself is taken as proof of need. Yet families of four with annual incomes of $18,315 are eligible; that figure is roughly equal to the national median for full-time, year-round workers.

The news media are repeating the same errors that they made ten and fifteen years ago. There is still a rush to portray all lower-income people as being in dire need and incapable of feeding themselves. Even though food stamp enrollment has increased by 2 million since President Reagan took office, popular accounts portray budget cuts as threatening millions with starvation.

Food policy has been shaped by waves of hysteria, by rarely verified accounts of elderly people who eat dog food, and by politicians competing to appear generous. Politicians have another motive besides: By raising eligibility levels, they have helped dispose of government's embarrassing agricultural surpluses. Politicians have long acted as though government can feed people better than people can feed themselves. Programs like school lunches continued growing despite repeated proof that government meals fail to provide good nutrition at least as often as—and for the nonpoor, more often than—private meals.

The Congressional Budget Office, which is staffed largely by liberal Democrats, conceded in 1980:

Despite some limited cases of severe malnutrition found by the Senate Subcommittee on Employment, Manpower, and Poverty in the Mississippi Delta in 1967, statements that severe malnutrition exists on a national scale have never been documented, even during the early years of the "War on Poverty" programs.[47]

"Ten million" was the rallying cry of the late sixties; but since almost twice as many poor people had good or adequate diets as had bad diets in 1965, it is likely that at least half of the 10 million poor with bad diets ate badly because of habit rather than sheer need. And of those, several million were probably already receiving food stamps and surplus commodities. Thus, although in 1968 there may have been 2 million or 3 million people with poor diets who were not receiving federal food assistance, Congress responded by increasing food stamp enrollment by 20 million and increasing nutrition spending twentyfold. Yet malnutrition still exists, and it will exist as long as eating is a matter of individual choice. In diet, as in everything else, some people will always make bad decisions. We cannot end malnutrition without ending people's control over their own diets.

CHARADES

Pulitzer-prize-winning journalist Nick Kotz wrote in 1969 that "hunger provided a meaningful new metaphor for the issue of poverty in affluent America * * *"[48] Liberals realized in the late 1960s that handouts had lost their appeal to the majority; a new cover was needed for increasing redistribution. Thus the myth of mass hunger was born—largely as a tactical move to evade the backlash against the Great Society. Probably many of the people clamoring for massive increases in the late 1960s sincerely believed that more free food was really needed. But many others—especially some of the leaders—were probably aware of the charade.

Proof that redistribution alone was the main motivation is that the programs continued expanding long after they had reached the levels that proponents originally said would end hunger in America. Office of Economic Opportunity Director Sargent Shriver said in 1967, when the federal government spent roughly $700 million on food assistance, that another billion dollars would be sufficient to end the problem. Another billion dollars was appropriated, and then another, and still another—and yet the more money spent, the hungrier the poor supposedly became. Eventually, only government provision of a full diet for all citizens with low incomes was seen as satisfactory.

The issue of mass hunger has emotionalized and muddled American politics for the past sixteen years. It is easy to understand why politicians and much of the media cling to the myth: If it were widely recognized that most of the poor are not severely deprived and not tottering on the edge of starvation and not utterly helpless, the rationale for a vast array of welfare programs would disappear. Politicians made a mockery of the definition of need and denigrated the poor in order to expand the pork barrel. We now have a hodgepodge of ineffective food programs because congressmen believe they can win votes by supporting subsidies for people who can feed themselves.

If government is resolved to take care of everyone, it would make far more sense to fight malnutrition than hunger. Hunger can usually be rectified by individual effort, but malnutrition is more often the result of ignorance or sheer poverty. The Congressional Budget Office noted in 1980 that "specific nutrients could be added to children's diets through targeted fortification schemes. Vitamin fortification could provide for 100% of a child's RDA for less than $3 a year in ingredient costs."[49] In 1975 Stanley Lebergott wrote in Wealth and Want, "Fifty dollars worth of milk plus vitamin pills annually would bring every poor family up to the U.S. nutrition average."[50] Indeed, passing out vitamin pills to the poor would be far cheaper and more effective nutritionally than current programs and would not destroy anyone's incentive to provide for himself.

Charles Schultze, President Carter's chief economic adviser, estimated in 1971 that federal agricultural policies add 15 percent to the retail cost of food. Journalist Nick Kotz observed in his 1969 book, Let Them Eat Promises, that the Food and Drug Administration and the USDA prohibit domestic marketing of many super-enriched food products being marketed by American corporations in Third World countries. The FDA prohibits manufacturers from adding nutrients to candy and soft drinks—or to any other food that in its opinion lacks "nutritional logic" to justify the enrichment.[51]

DEBILITATING DEPENDENCE

The working and elderly poor who are too proud to go on the dole are caught in a crossfire as social workers beg them to abandon their independence while politicians destroy the purchasing power of their food dollar. It is farcical to hear politicians sobbing over the poor's plight while they try to raise food prices by hook or by crook or by PIK. George McGovern, the leading advocate for increased food assistance during the 1970s, pushed high price supports for almost all commodities. Though he was generous to the poor who surrendered their independence and went on the dole, he showed no sympathy for low-income families who tried to feed themselves.

There are probably still a handful of hungry people in the United States despite the federal government's efforts to foist food on them. But the answer is not to increase food assistance—if that would abolish hunger, then hunger would have become extinct long ago. Many of the stories in the press about hungry kids deal with families who get food stamps or other food aid but fail to budget properly. When individual irresponsibility or imprudence is the cause of hunger, it makes more sense to provide soup kitchens rather than a month's worth of food stamps. National policy should not turn on the most sensational examples the evening news team can find.

The great myth underlying the growth of food assistance is that nutrition is largely dependent on income. But in 1955—when half the poor lived in rural, non-metropolitan areas—the Household Food Consumption Survey found, "In farm diets, most nutrients other than ascorbic acid were little affected by income."[52] The CBO concluded in 1977, "It still remains unclear if increased food purchases * * * means improved nutritional status."[53] The great majority of bad diets, now as in 1955, are due to ignorance and bad habit, not low income.

The astounding thing about the growth of food aid is that for almost every targeted group, a federal program already existed to help the poor feed themselves. Most of the surge in the food stamp program in the late sixties and early seventies came from automatically enrolling the recipients of public assistance—a program that was supposedly helping the poor buy food. Throughout the 1970s, Congress strove to increase food stamp enrollment among the elderly, whose increased Social Security benefits were supposedly justified by their need for a decent standard of living. (And in 1974, Supplemental Security Income payments were added to give a decent income to any elderly who missed the Social Security bonanza.) Food stamp advocates insist that food stamps are vital for the unemployed—for whom unemployment compensation benefits were created in 1935, specifically to prevent them from going hungry. Either food stamps are unnecessary for the vast majority of recipients, or every other major federal assistance program is a failure.

The other food assistance programs—from WIC to school lunches to school breakfast to child care—feed people who either are already eligible for food stamps or do not need a handout to feed themselves. We can be humanitarian without paying for eight meals a day for poor people. If Congress cannot summon the courage to tighten the food stamp program, it should at least end duplicate benefits and abolish food handouts for anyone above the poverty line. Taxpayers should not be coerced to feed those who can feed themselves.

Hunger has become an issue to conjure with—a political magic wand to mesmerize the public's critical faculties. Despite a thirtyfold increase in food aid for the poor since 1955, there has been little or no improvement in their diets. Food programs have wasted billions, lured millions onto the dole, and perpetrated the myth that a low income is automatically debilitating.

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT EXTENSION

● Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, in view of the short time available to the Congress to extend the Defense Production Act, which expires September 30, the Banking Committee has reported S. 1852 without a formal report. In order that Members may be informed of the Banking Committee's action on the bill, I would like to ask unanimous consent that a summary of the committee's action on S. 1852 be included at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY AND EXPLANATION OF S. 1852, THE DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT

I. HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATION

On September 19, 1983, Senator Trible introduced S. 1852, which was referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs. Due to the non-controversial nature of the legislation and the need for prompt enactment before the September 30 expiration of the Defense Production Act, the Committee agreed, through a poll of its members to report the bill.

II. PURPOSE OF THE LEGISLATION

The purpose of S. 1852, the Defense Production Act Extension of 1983, is to extend the expiring titles of the Defense Production Act of 1950 for a period of 5 years from the present termination date of September 30, 1983 until September 30, 1988. These titles provide the sole authority for a number of programs designed to maintain the national defense industrial production base in peacetime, prepare mobilization programs and provide a pool of trained manpower for war production management.

S. 1852 is also intended to insure that project proposals submitted to the Committee under Sections 301, 302 and 303 of Title III of the Act are carefully evaluated in accordance with specific standards, which are established in the bill. These standards are virtually identical with those formulated by the Defense Department for the Department's use in developing project proposals. Inclusion of these standards in the bill will insure that DOD, and all other agencies proposing to use Title III authorities will seriously evaluate proposals using established uniform criteria. Among the criteria established in the bill for Title III project proposals is one requiring that such proposal be the most cost effective means of addressing a particular problem. The determination of cost effectiveness is intended to include, where appropriate, considerations of the availability of supplies from foreign sources, the probability for interruptions in supply, and probable impacts of such interruptions on the price of a particular commodity. The Committee understands that these evaluations involve projections of future supply, demand and other factors, and as such are not expected to be exact estimates of future costs and benefits of Title III programs.

S. 1852 also establishes a means for Congressional approval of Title III proposals to replace certain legislative veto provisions in the Act, which are no longer operable as a result of the Supreme Court's decision in Chadha v. Immigration and Naturalization Service. Under current law, loans and loan guarantees in excess of $48 million and $38 million, respectively, are subject to a legislative veto by one house of Congress. There is no provision for a legislative veto of purchase guarantees. The bill provides for all loans, loan guarantees and purchase guarantees to be approved by the Congress through the authorization process or by Joint Resolution. This change will eliminate the current uncertainty over whether these provisions of the DPA require an authorization before funds are appropriated and will insure that the expenditure of public funds for Title III programs is subject to Congressional scrutiny by the Committee before appropriations are made.

The administration's fiscal year 1984 budget request

The Administration requested $200 million in fiscal year 1984 for programs under Title III of the DPA. The Committee reviewed the program proposals submitted by the Department of Defense (DOD) and requested a thorough evaluation of these proposals by the General Accounting Office. GAO determined that the DOD projects had not been adequately justified either in terms of national security or economic benefits. Moreover, the cost-effectiveness of DPA proposals compared to other alternatives was not adequately justified for any of the nine projects, according to GAO. In summary, the General Accounting Office found that the projects submitted did not meet DOD's own self-imposed criteria. The Committee agrees with these findings. The Committee has therefore determined that action on the Administration's $200 million request for fiscal year 1984 will be deferred until such time as the Committee receives adequate justification for these or other proposals. The Committee will review with care any resubmission of the DOD's project proposals in the future.

III. SYNOPSIS OF THE LEGISLATION

Titles I, III and the non-permanent sections of Titles VII of the Defense Production Act (DPA) have regularly been renewed by the Congress. Title I provides authorizations for the Defense Priorities System, an energy priorities system and for the management of these systems. Title III authorizes the President to guarantee loans and to take other financial measures necessary to expand productive capacity and supply in the interest of national defense. Title VII prohibits discrimination against small business firms in achieving the objectives of the DPA, provides for the National Defense Executive Reserve, establishes other authorities regarding personnel carrying out programs under the Act and provides for oversight of the programs under the Act. The permanent provisions of Title VII, which are not affected by this extension legislation, authorize the promulgation of cost accounting standards to cover government contractors and permit the President to grant antitrust immunity to industrial defense purposes at the request of the President.

The remaining provisions of the Act, contained in Titles II, IV, V and VI, have not been renewed since the period following the end of the Korean War and are not affected by this extension of the Act. These standby provisions provide wartime authority for condemnation, price and wage stabilization, the settlement of labor disputes and control of consumer and real estate credit.

IV. THE NEED FOR AND EXPLANATION OF THE LEGISLATION

The Defense Production Act is the sole statutory vehicle for insuring that the Nation's industrial base is kept in a state of readiness in peacetime so that new programs may be initiated and standby programs may be expanded in the event of mobilization. The preparedness functions served by the DPA are evident in the many programs authorized by the Act. An expiration of the Defense Production Act could lead to a costly disruption of these programs which are vital to the national defense.

Impacts of the Expiration of the Defense Production Act

Highest National Urgency Priority Rated Weapons Programs

Approximately 25% of defense procurements receive the highest national urgency DX priority ratings. These programs could experience delay and setbacks in production schedules due to the slower delivery of essential materials and equipment. DX programs can include such high priority projects as the B-1 bomber, Trident submarine, the MX missile program, command-control and communcations systems, and the Abrams tank. The negative impact of the loss of priorities support for these weapon systems can severly affect our strategic posture.

Defense Priority Rated Programs

All other defense procurements receive DO priority ratings to help ensure the timely delivery of the goods and equipment and early completion of production schedules. Priorities support is extended for all military and atomic energy production and construction, foreign military assistance, and space projects. Expiration of the Act could stretch out delivery dates on all these programs. For example, the resulting slowdown in the delivery on foreign military assistance could negatively impact on our relations with friends and allies.

Deployment of Military Forces

The deployment of military forces in a major emergency would be severely hindered because the necessary transportation assets are made available for defense use under DP Act, Title I authorities. The Civil Reserve Air Fleet (CRAF), the Contingency Response Plan (CORE), and other rapid deployment plans and programs would be unable to operate without these authorities, and consequently the mobility of military forces is severely hampered.

Increased Procurement Costs

The lapse in DP Act extension or its termination would add to the costs of defense procurements because of the additional risk to the contractors in obtaining critical and scarce materials and equipment. Contracts let without priorities support could have difficulty in obtaining materials and equipment in future years especially if the economy heats up again as was the case in the late 1970's.

Transportation Strikes

Title I of the DP Act is the only Presidential authority (Section 101(b)) available to priorities transport movements in the civil economy in the event of a rail or truckers' strike. This authority was used three times in the early 1970's and its use was planned in the recent air traffic controller and railroad strikes to ensure the movement of defense goods and personnel. Its absence will severely limit the President's ability to alleviate the impacts of a national transportation strike.

Machine Tool Trigger Order Program (MTTOP)

The basic authority for the establishment and maintenance of the Machine Tool Trigger Order Program (MTTOP) is Title III of the DP Act. Without this authority the program would have to be terminated and existing standby purchase agreements would have to be cancelled. To date, thirty-five companies have been invited to participate and approximately one-third of these standby agreements have been signed (16 agreements) covering 940 items with contract values of $222 million. The program is a government/industry cooperative effort to cut mobilization lead-times by speeding delivery of machine tools essential to defense production. Cancellation of the program would set back our mobilization preparedness effort with this industry by 12 to 18 months, if a mobilization occurred.

Loss of Mobilization Preparedness Lead Time

Dismantling the DP Act priorities and allocations systems and other contingency programs would seriously hinder any mobilization effort during the first 12-18 months because of the lack of trained personnel and administrative systems between government and industry.

Critical Materials and Forging Presses

New contracts for the guayule project would be prevented and DOD's overall project would be in danger.

National Defense Executive Reserve

The 11 NDER units would have to be disbanded and the reserve membership terminated by the departments and agencies with the resulting loss of talent and experience necessary for adequate mobilization preparedness.

V. COST ESTIMATE

Enactment of S. 1852 would entail no new or different costs from those incurred in administering DPA programs in the past.

VI. REGULATORY IMPACT

This bill, the Defense Production Act Extension of 1983, does not create any new regulatory requirements within the meaning of rule XXVI, paragraph 11(b) of the Rules of the Senate. It merely extends the authority for existing regulations issued for the administration of title I priorities and allocation systems and for reporting requirements under section 705.

Existing regulatory impact, extended by this legislation, is significant. Any defense contractor or potential defense contractor may be required to perform government contracts in preference to commercial work under title I. Producers of "controlled materials," regardless of whether they hold defense contracts, are also required to set-aside a portion of their production under the Defense Materials System authorized by title I.

VII. EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS

The executive branch transmitted to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, the following letter, endorsing the extension of the Defense Production Act of 1950.

FEDERAL EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT AGENCY,
Washington, D.C.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Defense Production Act of 1950 is the cornerstone of the present legal structure for ensuring that we are prepared to meet national emergencies requiring the mobilization of the Nation's industrial and material resources. Its continuation is essential to the national defense. Enclosure A is proposed legislation which would extend the Defense Production Act for an additional 5 years.

Title I of the Defense Production Act provides authority to require priority treatment for vital defense contracts as well as authority to allocate materials and facilities for defense programs. It is under these authorities that the Departments of Commerce, Energy, and Transportation have established specific resources priority and allocated systems. Failure to extend the Act will lead to severe and costly impacts on our weapons acquisitions and defense preparedness programs. See Enclosure B.

A 5-year extension will provide orderly programming for expansion of essential industrial capacity and resource supply projects which require several years for completion. In addition, the Administration has authority in Fiscal Year 1983 and is seeking funding in Fiscal Year 1984 to carry out the purposes of Title III of the Act. This funding will help to expand productive capacity and supply beyond levels needed to meet civilian demand in order to reduce the time required for full mobilization.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection to the submission of this proposal for the consideration of the Congress and that its adoption would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

GEORGE JETT,
General Counsel.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. EAGLETON, and Mr. STENNIS):

WAR POWERS ACT OF 1983

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I rise to speak briefly of a measure Senators EAGLETON and STENNIS are introducing to amend the War Powers Act to correct its obvious deficiencies.

U.S. involvement in Lebanese hostilities shows that the War Powers Resolution has serious limitations. It does not stop a President from sending troops into hostilities whenever and wherever he chooses. And as we have seen, Congress is very reluctant to consider withdrawing American troops once they have been deployed, even if their deployment appears open ended, is poorly justified and is inconsistent with the requirements of the War Powers Resolution. Thus does America gradually become embroiled in wars through deployment of troops into hostilities and through investments, of money and advisors, in war-torn countries.

We would not be faced with this type of situation in Lebanon if the Senate version of the War Powers Resolution had been adopted when this matter was orginally considered. That measure—primarily the work product of Senators Javits, EAGLETON, and STENNIS—passed the Senate on July 20, 1973, by a 72-to-18 vote. It would have precluded the President from introducing troops into hostilities or areas of imminent hostilities without the prior consent of Congress, except in certain specified circumstances—in order to rescue U.S. citizens or to respond to armed attack. It would have insured that the collective judgment of Congress and the President be provided in such key decisions of war and peace.

Had the original Senate bill prevailed in conference and become law, we would not now face the current crisis over U.S. military involvement in Lebanon. If I judge the mood of the American people, and the mood of the House and Senate, correctly, Congress would never have authorized President Reagan to send the marines into direct involvement in hostilities in Lebanon in the first place.

That Senate bill represents a far wiser, safer, more prudent course.

Therefore, with Senators EAGLETON and STENNIS, I am today introducing the proposed War Powers Act of 1983, a bill to amend the War Powers Resolution of 1973, restoring the War Powers Resolution to its original strength along the lines provided under the Senate-passed measure which was the result of 3 years of development by the Foreign Relations Committee.

Under the leadership of my two distinguished colleagues and Senator Jacob Javits, the Senate took the lead in developing and creating war powers legislation. Throughout its consideration of the War Powers Act during 1971-73, more than two-thirds of this body consistently voted for this legislation. A majority of these supporters were also cosponsors.

The Senate made a clear-cut delineation of the war powers of the legislative and executive branches of government. Our bill codified that constitutional balance and, to meet modern contingencies, granted limited emergency authority to the Commander in Chief. Extensive testimony by leading historians and constitutional scholars supported the constitutionality of the Senate bill.

Under the Senate-passed bill in 1973, the decision to initiate engagement in hostilities was a joint executive-legislative responsibility. Under the current war powers resolution, the responsibility for committing troops, and for justifying that commitment, is entrusted solely with the President.

Historically, the war powers resolution of 1973 was an important first step in congressional reassertion of its war powers. But it was only a first step.

The War Powers Resolution has proved inadequate and of limited effectiveness.

This law simply never comes to grips with the fundamental issue of codifying a constitutional balance between the executive and the legislature in warmaking.

The Founding Fathers vested the warmaking power exclusively in Congress, refusing to confer it upon the President.

The question of whether our Nation shall be at war or peace is far too awesome a decision for one person to make. Such unbridled power in the hands of one individual is dangerous to peace and to our free society.

In Abraham Lincoln's words, "no one man should hold the power of bringing this oppression upon us." In our nuclear age, preserving the checks and balances of our constitutional system is more crucial than ever before.

The framers of our constitutional system greatly mistrusted any executive having such power. They therefore created a tight framework for congressional control over warmaking. Under article I, section 8, of our Constitution, both Houses of Congress are vested with the power to declare war and to raise and support armies, and are imbued with all power necessary and proper for carrying out these functions and the functions of the other branches.

The framers were, to paraphase delegate George Mason, for clogging war and facilitating peace.

In the oft-quoted debate, the Constitution's drafters substituted "declare war" for "make war" in the listing of Congress powers to insure that the executive could protect American forces in wartime and could repel invasions. The change was in no way a grant of power for the President to take the Nation to war.

Under our Constitution, the President has a restrictive power to conduct wars as Commander in Chief. Within that sphere he is supreme, and Congress may not interfere with his command of authorized military involvements.

Alexander Hamilton, a strong proponent of executive power, fully agreed, however, that the authorization power—the decision to make war or peace—rests with Congress. In fact, during the Philadelphia debates Hamilton used the words "declare," "authorize," and "begun" interchangeably.

Hamilton emphasized this point in Federalist No. 69:

> The President is to be commander in chief of the army and navy of the United States. In this respect his authority would be nominally the same with that of the king of Great Britain, but in substance much inferior to it. It would amount to nothing more than the supreme command and direction of the military and naval forces, as first General and Admiral of the Confederacy, while that of the British king extends to the declaring of war and to the raising and regulating of fleets and armies—all which, by the Constitution under consideration, would appertain to the legislature.

When the Senate War Powers Act was being debated a decade ago, Senator Jacob Javits warned that the balance between the executive and the legislature in warmaking had been practically obliterated.

To quote Senator Javits:

> I doubt that there is anything now that an American President, if he simply wanted to cite precedent, might not feel he can do to plunge the U.S. into the broadest scale war without reference to Congress.

This is still too true today. The emergence of the United States as a superpower since World War II has seen a dramatic shift in actual Presidential power over war and peace—but not a shift in constitutional authority.

It is essential that Congress assert its constitutional role of primacy in the area of declaring and initiating war. We must establish our authority at the outset of U.S. involvement in hostilities.

This is what our bill—based on the original Senate-passed legislation—would accomplish.

Much of the interpretation and explanation of this act can be found in the very thorough Senate Foreign Relations Committee report of June 14, 1973 (Report No. 220). Let me just outline the main provisions of this act.

The key provisions insure that the President must come to Congress first—I repeat, first, before committing troops into hostilities or areas of imminent hostilities. Section 3, spells out the emergency circumstances where the President may—without the prior consent of Congress—introduce troops into hostilities or situations where imminent introduction into hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances.

Thus, the first three clauses of section 3 codify the President's authority to repel sudden attacks and protect U.S. nationals—powers based on the intention of the constitutional convention and on precedent.

Clause (4) permits the use of the Armed Forces in hostilities, or situations where hostilities are clearly imminent, "pursuant to specific statutory authorization." Under no other circumstances would the President have the authority to introduce our Armed Forces into hostilities or imminent hostile situations in the absence of a congressional declaration of war.

Section 5—which along with section 3 has been called the heart and core of the original Senate bill—would provide that the use of Armed Forces under any of the emergency conditions listed in section 3 shall not last more than 30 days unless Congress adopts legislation specifically authorizing such continued use. Thus, the President would be forewarned against any use that would be unlikely to command the support of majorities in both Houses of Congress.

In addition to these provisions of the original Senate act, section 5(b) of the proposed War Powers Act of 1983 incorporates a 1975 amendment proposed by Senator EAGLETON that would prohibit the expenditure of any funds for any use of the Armed Forces in violation of this act, unless specifically otherwise provided by a law making specific reference to section 5(b) of this act.

The War Powers Act of 1983 would take effect upon enactment, but would not apply to any use of our Armed Forces being made on that date. However, the provisions of the War Powers Resolution of 1973 as in effect would continue applying to any use of the Armed Forces to which these provisons were applicable on the day before the date of enactment of this Act.

This proposed War Powers Act of 1983, in our era of undeclared wars, thus would provide for the conditions of modern warfare. It does so in such a way as to fulfill—not to alter, amend or adjust—the intent of the Constitution and its framers regarding the war powers.

Our bill would restore the intended constitutional balance of power over warmaking.

In closing, I think it appropriate to heed the warning of Thomas Jefferson nearly two centuries ago:

> Confidence is everywhere the parent of despotism—free government is founded in jealousy; . . . it is jealousy and not confidence which prescribes limited constitutions to bind down those we are obliged to trust with power . . . In questions of power, then, let no more be heard of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief with the chains of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of our bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1906

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "War Powers Act of 1983".

SECTION 2. The War Powers Resolution (Public Law 93-148, 87 Stat. 555 et seq.) is amended to read as follows:

"SHORT TITLE

"SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the 'War Powers Act'.

"PURPOSE AND POLICY

"SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this Act to fulfill the intent of the Constitution of the United States and insure that the collective judgment of both the Congress and the President will apply to the introduction of the Armed Forces of the United States into hostilities and to the continuation of the use of such armed forces in such hostilities. Under Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, it is specifically provided that the Congress shall have the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution not only its own powers but also 'all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof'. At the same time, this Act is not intended to encroach upon the recognized powers of the President, as Commander in Chief, to conduct hostilities authorized by the Congress, to respond to attacks or the imminent threat of attacks upon the United States, including its territories and possessions, to respond to attacks or the imminent threat of attacks against the United States Armed Forces, and, under proper circumstances, to rescue endangered citizens of the United States located in foreign countries.

"EMERGENCY USE OF THE ARMED FORCES

"SEC. 3. In the absence of a declaration of war by the Congress, the United States Armed Forces may be introduced into hostilities or into a situation where the imminent introduction of such forces into hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances, only—

"(1) to repel an attack upon the United States or its territories or possessions; to take necessary and appropriate retaliatory actions in the event of such an attack; and to forestall the direct and imminent threat of such an attack;

"(2) to repel an attack against the United States Armed Forces located outside of the United States and its territories and possessions, and to forestall the direct and imminent threat of such an attack;

"(3) to protect citizens of the United States while evacuating them as rapidly as possible from any country in which such citizens, there with the express or tacit consent of the government of such country, are being subjected to a direct and imminent threat to their lives, either sponsored by such government or beyond the power of such government to control: Provided, That the President shall make every effort to terminate such a threat without using the United States Armed Forces: And provided further, That the President shall where possible, obtain the consent of the government of such country before using such armed forces; or

"(4) pursuant to specific statutory authorization.

"SEC. 4. The introduction of the United States Armed Forces into hostilities, or into a situation described in section 3 of this Act, under any of the circumstances described in section 3 shall be reported promptly in writing by the President to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, together with a full account of the circumstances necessitating such introduction, the constitutional and legislative authority for such introduction, the estimated scope and duration of the use of such armed forces in the hostilities or situation involved, and the consistency of such use with the provisions of section 3. Whenever the United States Armed Forces are engaged in hostilities outside of the United States and its territories and possessions, the President shall, so long as such forces continue to be engaged in such hostilities, report to the Congress periodically on the status of such engagement as well as the scope and expected duration of such engagement and such hostilities, but in no event shall such report be submitted to the Congress less often than every six months.

"THIRTY-DAY AUTHORIZATION PERIOD

"SEC. 5. (a) After the introduction of the United States Armed Forces into hostilities, or into a situation described in section 3 of this Act, under any of the circumstances described in section 3, the use of such armed forces in the hostilities or situation involved shall not be sustained beyond thirty days from the date of such introduction except as provided in a specific law enacted by the Congress and pursuant to the provisions thereof.

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law unless such law specifically otherwise provides by specific reference to this subsection, no funds made available under any law may be obligated or expended for any use of the United States Armed Forces prohibited by subsection (a) of this section, by section 3, or by a law or joint resolution described in section 6 of this Act.

"TERMINATION WITHIN THIRTY-DAY PERIOD

"SEC. 6. The use of the United States Armed Forces in hostilities, or a situation described in section 3 of this Act, under any of the circumstances described in section 3 shall be terminated prior to the thirty-day period specified in section 5(a) of this Act of Congress by a law or joint resolution so directs.

"CONGRESSIONAL PRIORITY PROVISIONS

"SEC. 7. (a)(1) Any bill or resolution (pursuant to section 5(a) of this Act) authorizing the continuation of the use of the United States Armed Forces after their introduction, in any of the circumstances described in clause (1), (2), or (3) of section 3 of this Act, into hostilities or a situation described in section 3 of this Act or (pursuant to section 6 of this Act) directing the termination of such use, shall, if sponsored or cosponsored by one-third of the Members of the House of Congress in which it is introduced, be considered reported out no later than one day following its introduction unless such House shall otherwise determine by yeas and nays. Any such bill or resolution referred to a committee after having passed one House of Congress shall be considered reported out in the other House within one day after it is so referred, unless such House shall otherwise determine by yeas and nays.

"(2) Any bill or resolution so authorizing the continuation of such use of such armed forces or so directing the termination of such use shall, if not sponsored or cosponsored by one-third of the Members of the House in which it is introduced, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives or the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, as the case may be, and one such bill or resolution shall be reported out by such committee together with its recommendations within seven calendar days, unless such House shall otherwise determine by yeas and nays. Any such bill or resolution, if not so sponsored or cosponsored, which has been passed by one House and is to be referred to a committee of the other House shall be referred in such other House to the committee named in the preceding sentence and shall be reported out by such committee together with its recommendations within seven calendar days and shall thereupon become the pending business of such House and shall be voted upon within three calendar days, unless such House shall otherwise determine by yeas and nays.

"(b) Any bill or resolution described in subsection (a) of this section shall, immediately upon being reported to the floor, discharged from Committee, placed on the calendar, or held at the desk, become the pending business of the House in question (in the case of the Senate the time for debate shall be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents) and shall be voted on within three calendar days thereafter, unless such House shall otherwise determine by yeas and nays.

"(c) In the case of any disagreement between the two Houses of Congress with respect to a bill or resolution described in subsection (a) that is passed by both Houses, conferees shall be promptly appointed and the committee of conference shall make and file a report with respect to such bill or resolution within three calendar days after such bill or resolution is referred to the committee of conference. Notwithstanding any rule in either House concerning the printing of conference reports in the RECORD or concerning any delay in the consideration of such reports, such conference reports shall be acted on by both Houses not later than three calendar days after being filed. In the event the conferees are unable to agree within 48 hours, they shall report back to their respective Houses in disagreement.

"INTERPRETATION OF ACT

"SEC. 8. (a) Statutory authorization to introduce United States Armed Forces into hostilities or into situations where imminent introduction of such forces into hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances (or, after such introduction, to sustain the use of such armed forces in the hostilities or situation involved) shall not be inferred—

"(1) from any provision of law (whether or not in effect before the date of the enactment of this Act), including any provision contained in any appropriation Act, unless such provision specifically authorizes such introduction (or use) of such armed forces and states that it is intended to constitute specific statutory authorization within the meaning of this Act; or

"(2) from any treaty heretofore or hereafter ratified unless such treaty is implemented by a law specifically authorizing such introduction (or use) of such armed forces and stating that it is intended to constitute specific statutory authorization within the meaning of this Act.

"(b) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to require any further specific statutory authorization to permit members of United States Armed Forces to participate jointly with members of the military forces of one or more foreign countries in the headquarters operations of high-level military commands which were established prior to the date of enactment of this Act and pursuant to the United Nations Charter or any treaty ratified by the United States prior to such date.

"(c) For the purposes of this Act, any reference to the introduction of the United States Armed Forces shall be deemed to include a reference to the assignment of members of such armed forces to command, coordinate, participate in the movement of, or accompany regular or irregular military forces in or of any foreign country or of any foreign government when such military forces are engaged, or there exists an imminent threat that such forces will become engaged, in hostilities.

"(d) For the purposes of this Act, the terms 'introduced into hostilities' and 'introduction into hostilities' each include commitment, engagement, and involvement in hostilities, including bombardment.

"SEPARABILITY CLAUSE

"SEC. 9. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of the Act and the application of such provision to any other person or circumstance shall not be affected thereby.

"EFFECTIVE DATE

"SEC. 10. This Act shall take effect on the date of the enactment of the War Powers Act of 1983, but shall not apply to any use of the United States Armed Forces being made on such date.".

SEC. 3. Notwithstanding the amendment made by section 2 of this Act, the provisions of the War Powers Resolution shall continue in effect with respect to any use of the Armed Forces of the United States to which the provisions of such Resolution were applicable on the day before the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 4. The title of the War Powers Resolution is amended to read as follows: "An Act to make rules governing certain uses of the Armed Forces of the United States in the absence of a declaration of war by the Congress."

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I have a distinct sense of deja vu. Back in 1975, when I first introduced war power amendments, there was little interest in rectifying the omissions of the War Powers Act. The war in Vietnam was over. America, after its long agony in Vietnam, was at peace. Senators, like the American people they represented, were no longer interested in war, war-making, war-declaring, war-circumscribing. Why waste time improving a now arcane subject like the War Powers Act. Let us move on to new, happier things.

Now, once again, we are involved in war—in Lebanon, in Nicaragua, in El Salvador. The War Powers Act is no longer arcane. Every Member of the Senate now knows section 4(a)(1) and section 5(b) as if it were part of his or her psyche. Every Member of the Senate worries about how we get into war and worries even more about how we get out.

The War Powers Act of 1973 was an imperfect compromise between a House that was not really all that much interested in the subject and a Senate which wanted a War Powers Act—any War Powers Act—at any price.

As we seek to apply the act to the situation in Lebanon, we see its shortcomings.

If Congress truly and deeply wants to recapture its rightful constitutional role in the war-making decision process, it must consider rectifying the inadequacies of the War Powers Act.

Today, I yield to Senator CRANSTON, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, in introducing a revised War Powers Act based on the original Senate-passed version of the War Powers Act and my subsequent amendments offered in 1975. He has, through his seat on Foreign Relations, the jurisdictional forum to pursue this subject matter.

I hope, now that we have debated war powers in the context of Lebanon, that we will now consider the subject matter in its broadest and fullest context.

There is no sense waiting for Nicaragua or El Salvador to blossom into even more worrisome crises before we reevaluate and, perhaps, recast the fundamental structure of the War Powers Act. While Lebanon is fresh in our minds, now is the time to act.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to put the following material in the RECORD.

First, my original 1975 amendments to the War Powers Act and a statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a Senate floor speech thereon.

Second, a comparison of the key operative provisions of today's War Powers Act with the original Senate-passed version of the act—passed July 20, 1973.

Third, the evolution of the war powers bill from Senate to House and, thence, out of conference.

Fourth, the final half of chapter 11 and all of chapter 12 of my book entitled "War and Presidential Power," by Thomas F. Eagleton, published by Liveright in 1974.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1790

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. Section 2(c) of the War Powers Resolution (Public Law 93-148; 87 Stat. 555) is amended by—

(1) striking out the word "or" in clause (2) thereof; and

(2) striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "or (4) the necessity of protecting the constitutional rights of citizens of the United States by rescuing such citizens, as rapidly as possible, from any country in which such citizens are being involuntarily held with the express or tacit consent of the government of such country or by expeditiously evacuating such citizens from any country in which such citizens are voluntarily present and are being subjected to a direct and imminent personal threat, either sponsored by the government of such country or beyond the power of such government to control. In using the Armed Forces of the United States to protect the rights of any United States citizen pursuant to clause (4) of this subsection, the President shall do so only with the degree of force required to remove such citizens from personal danger.".

SEC. 2. Section 3 of the War Powers Resolution is amended by—

(1) striking out "consult with Congress" and inserting in lieu thereof "seek the advice and counsel of the Congress";

(2) striking out "consult regularly with the Congress" and inserting in lieu thereof "regularly seek the advice and counsel of the Congress"; and

(3) adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "For purposes of this section, the words 'seek the advice and counsel of' mean that the President, before taking any steps which would firmly commit United States Armed Forces to hostilities, shall in every possible instance discuss fully the proposed decision for using such Armed Forces with Members of Congress, including but not limited to the majority and minority leaders of the Senate and the House of Representatives, the chairmen of the Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees of the Senate, and the chairmen of the Armed Services and International Relations Committees of the House of Representatives and shall fully consider their advice and counsel before committing the United States Armed Forces to any such proposed decision.".

SEC. 3. Section 8 of the War Powers Resolution is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) Any person employed by, under contract to, or under the direction of any department or agency of the United States government who is either (a) actively engaged in hostilities in any foreign country; or (b) advising any regular or irregular military forces engaged in hostilities in any foreign country shall be deemed to be a member of the Armed Forces of the United States for the purposes of this Act.".

PREPARED STATEMENT OF SENATOR THOMAS F. EAGLETON

WAR POWERS

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to participate again in the important discussion of one of the most complex and sensitive issues Congress has had to address in the history of the Republic—war powers legislation. This is the fourth time I have been privileged to testify on this subject before this Committee. But it is the first opportunity, as the distinguished Chairman of this Committee, Senator Sparkman has said, "to reflect on normally heated questions in a period of peace and tranquility." In my judgment, the existing War Powers Resolution is tragically flawed. If we take this opportunity to amend the legislation in order to restore to Congress its rightful and constitutional role in the process by which we go to war, at some near or distant occasion, when our nation's will is again being tested in the international arena, we will be glad we took this quiet time to strengthen our constitutional system.

The effort to write war powers legislation in the late 1960's and early 1970's resulted from the excessive claim of Presidents of both parties of unilateral, inherent powers to commit the nation to war to the exclusion of any congressional role in the decision-making process.

With respect to Southeast Asia, our nation has suffered a series of frustrating deceptions—from the Tonkin Gulf to the illegal secret bombing of Cambodia. A phrase coined by Anthony Austin, in his prize-winning chronicle of our official entry into the Vietnam War, The President's War, seemed to sum up our fears: "the war-bred tyranny of kinds." After the 1970 Cambodia invasion had driven home with a vengeance the congressional erosion of war powers, a number of bills were introduced to restore the balance.

The bill that emerged from this Committee in 1971 was premised on the central principle that the decision to go to war, under our Constitution, is a decision for Congress alone to make. It sought to fulfill the intent of the framers of our Constitution, expressed so well by Alexander Hamilton, who said the war-making power "is the peculiar and exclusive province of Congress." Our founding fathers had had good reason—direct experience with the tyranny of a monarch with ultimate powers at his disposal—to assign matters of war and peace to the most representative branch of government.

The Senate bill was faithful to the original intent of the framers of our Constitution. The framers' central premise on war-making authority was clear: the decision to go to war, under our Constitution, is a decision for Congress alone to make.

Under our Constitution it is the Congress vested with numerous war-related powers: "to declare War," "to provide for the common Defense," "to define and punish . . . offenses against the Law of Nations," "to raise and support Armies . . .," "to provide and maintain a Navy," "to make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval forces," "to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repeal Invasions," "to provide for organizing, arming and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States." Congress also has the exclusive power to appropriate funds from the Treasury, and "to make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution . . . all powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Office thereof."

The President, under our Constitution, is vested, not with independent authority as sovereign, but with "executive power" of the United States. He has the duty to "take care that the Laws be faithfully executed." And the President is the commander-in-chief of our armed forces. James Maidson has these words to say about who would decide questions of war and peace under our system:

"Every just view that can be taken of this subject, administers the public of the necessity of a rigid adherence to the simple, the received, and the fundamental doctrine of the constitution, that the power to declare war, including the power of judging of the causes of war, is fully and exclusively vested in the legislature; that the executive has no right, in any case, to decide the question, whether there is or is not cause for declaring war; that the right of convening and informing Congress, whenever such a question seems to call for a decision, is all the right which the constitution has deemed requisite or proper . . . "

I fail to see how our Constitution could have made it clearer that Congress would provide prior authorization when American forces were committed to battle.

The legislation endorsed by the Senate in 1973 was consistent with our Constitution. We recognized that in certain emergency situations requiring immediate response—fast-moving crises where events would certainly overtake the deliberative nature of legislative response—the President had a limited unilateral power to respond. These exceptions were carefully circumscribed to avoid Presidential misuse. They were enumerated as follows:

First, the President could repel an armed attack upon the Central States, it territories and possessions; he could take necessary and appropriate retaliatory action in the event of such an attack; and he could act to forestall the direct and imminent threat of such an attack.

Second, he could respond to an attack on American forces legally deployed abroad.

And, third, under specified conditions the President could rescue American citizens abroad to provide for their immediate evacuation from a danger zone.

Each of the exceptions is a defensive action. Even those actions would have been submitted in time to Congress. Within 30 days, unless Congress acted to provide continued authority, the action was to have been terminated.

But it was a different sort of law which emerged from Conference with the House in October-November 1973. That law, now the existing War Powers Resolution, does not involve Congress in the decision-making process until after forces were committed to battle. The words about emergency authority are nonbinding and nonenforceable. The President has the unilateral authority to commit American troops anywhere in the world, under any conditions he decides, for 60 to 90 days. He gets a free 60 days, and a self-executing option for an additional 30 days, making it 90. Congress must be notified only 48 hours after the deployment of our forces.

In retrospect, we can see how difficult were the circumstances when the War Powers Resolution was passed. Between October and November 1973 Vice President Agnew resigned after pleading no contest to a charge of income tax evasion. President Nixon fired Watergate special prosecutor Archibald Cox and abolished the office—the now infamous "Saturday night massacre." The President found it necessary to go on television to announce "I'm not a crook," then the 18½ minute gap was disclosed. The House Democratic leadership agreed to have the Judiciary Committee begin an impeachment inquiry, and Republican Senators began discussing resignation in public.

We in Congress were frustrated with our failure to override eight successive Presidential vetoes, and, considering the tremendous pressures then created by the Watergate scandal, it is understandable how this Congress overrode President Nixon's war power veto. The irony, of course, is that we were actually expanding, not limiting Presidential war-making powers.

I believe the question of prior constitutional restraints is so essential to our system of government that the original legislation which twice passed the Senate should be passed again. In the coming days I hope to cosponsor such legislation with several of my colleagues. I have had a draft proposal prepared which, with a section by section analysis, I ask to be placed in the RECORD. I am not wedded to every detail of this draft. It will have served its purpose if it can help this Committee in these deliberations.

In addition, the commendable oversight hearings which this Committee is currently conducting may produce some other good ideas which may well strengthen the Resolution. Certainly, the Mayaguez crisis and the Cambodian and Vietnam evacuations carried out in 1975 under the terms of the existing War Powers Resolution show clearly there is room for improvement.

In those crises of 1975 the executive branch did not feel bound by the existing statute. The consultation process was inadequate and incomplete; many months after the Mayaguez rescue, for example, a House subcommittee oversight investigation was faced with delays and procedural obstacles in simply obtaining factual information on how the crisis had been managed. The Administration's report to the Congress of May 15, 1975 merely took note of Section 4(a)(1) of the Resolution, which calls for information on the introduction of U.S. forces into hostilities. Section 4(a)(3), which calls for a report on the enlargement of U.S. forces in another foreign nation, in this case Thailand, was ignored. Even more important, the President felt free to engage in retaliatory bombing of targets on the Cambodian mainland apparently unconnected with the rescue operation—which appears to run against the grain of our constitution.

In preparing these remarks I had the opportunity to review my closing remarks from April 12, 1973, the last time I was honored to participate with this Committee in this discussion. I concluded that testimony with these words:

"It is unfortunate that we in Congress, and Americans in general have a tendency to overlook serious situations until they erupt into crisis. There should be little doubt that the gradual erosion of congressional war powers has grown to crisis proportions. If we fail to act now after the horrors of Vietnam have so clearly exposed the danger of individual war-making, we may never again see the questions of war and peace being decided by the sobering and deliberative processes inherent in the concept of collective judgment."

I believe those words are still appropriate, and that this Committee has performed a most praiseworthy service by again deliberating the most vital of questions—how do we go to war?

WAR POWERS RESOLUTION AMENDMENTS—S. 1790

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, four times since April 3 the President has reported to Congress under the war powers resolution that he ordered American forces into a hostile—or potentially hostile—situation. On each occasion the President cited the Commander in Chief clause of the Constitution as authority for ordering the military operation.

Controversy will accompany any use of military force, and this is especially true in this post-Vietnam era. Debate over a President's judgment—over whether he used too little or too much force, or whether he needed to use force at all—is, in my opinion, a healthy after-effect of our Vietnam experience.

It is not my intention today, however, to engage in a retrospective analysis of or to quibble over President Ford's judgment in using U.S. forces. I believe it is more important at this time to objectively assess these recent experiences to see whether and how Congress became involved in the decisionmaking process—to see how the war powers resolution operated—and to suggest improvements both to better involve Congress in the future and to further define and proscribe the President's unilateral emergency power to use force.

Toward that end I am today introducing these amendments to the war powers resolution. Two of these amendments relate directly to the President's recent actions, and another simply broadens the coverage of the law without affecting its procedural provisions.

Before discussing these amendments in detail, I want to reiterate my basic disagreement with the approach taken in the war powers resolution and to modify that criticism somewhat by placing it in the context of recent events.

My opposition to the legislation when it emerged from the conference committee stemmed mainly from its failure to define in legally binding terms the emergency powers of the President and to insist that in all other cases Congress must authorize and initiate the introduction of U.S. forces into hostile situations.

The effort to write war powers legislation resulted from the excessive claims of President of unilateral, inherent powers to commit the Nation to war to the exclusion of any congressional role in the decisionmaking process.

The specter that faced Congress as it considered this issue after the invasion of Cambodia in 1970 was the complete usurpation of its war powers. Presidents began simply to order the troops into battle in the name of national security, claiming an "inherent" right to do so. And the courts refused to act on what was labeled a nonjusticiable "political question" between the other two branches of Government. Congress was left to its own means to recapture its most important constitutional prerogative.

Congress own means are considerable, for under the Constitution Congress can make "all laws which shall be necessary and proper" in carrying out the provisions of the Constitution. And the "necessary and proper" clause went further: Congress could also make laws "for carrying into execution—all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any Department or Officer thereof."

Especially in areas of the Constitution where the assignment of responsibility is vague or undefined, Congress has the necessary power to clarify and define. The war powers area is just such an area. Certainly Congress could act here to protect its own prerogatives while being careful not to impinge on the President's recognized right to act in emergencies to "repel sudden attacks."

Yet Congress did not so act. The reason, according to a brief prepared by House conferees considering war powers legislation, was that the "necessary and proper" clause did not give "Congress the right to define the powers of the President." I believe that the acceptance of such a statement is equivalent to a declaration of congressional impotence.

Nonetheless, my concern over the war powers resolution was grounded on practical as well as constitutional considerations. The procedure established by the resolution did not involve Congress in the decisionmaking process until after forces were committed to battle. I was concerned that such a procedure would tie Congress hands and contribute to rather than inhibit the derogation of warmaking responsibilities that had characterized the congressional performance in recent years.

It is not my purpose today to rehash the debate on this issue or to assert that recent experience has proven my case. I am here because I sense a very positive desire on the part of those who supported the war powers resolution to involve Congress in the decisionmaking process at the outset, even before the provisions of the statute come into play. I am encouraged, for example, that such leading advocates of the war powers resolution as Senator Javits, and Representatives Zablocki, Morgan, and Fraser, fought to inject the concept of congressional authorization into the Vietnam evacuation. Congress eventual failure to act on this matter cannot, therefore, be ascribed to any of those who worked so long and hard on the war powers resolution.

The amendments I offer today do not go to my central criticism of that resolution. I recognize that reversing the House on such a fundamental matter as the issue of prior authority would be next to impossible. And I will add, on the positive side, that as long as there is a growing awareness of Congress constitutional responsibility to initiate war and a growing resolve to invoke that power, there is, concomitantly, a diminishing requirement for a statutory approach to the problem.

Which leads me to my first amendment relating to the "Purpose and Policy" section of the resolution. Subsection 2(c) cites situations wherein the President can commit U.S. forces to a hostile situation without the prior approval of Congress. These situations as currently listed are: First, to repeal an attack upon the United States or its territories and possessions; and second, to repel attacks on U.S. forces stationed aboard.

Subsection 2(c), which of course is not binding on the President, can represent the policy of Congress as to the allocation of war powers. To the extent that 2(c) might exclude a generally accepted emergency power of the President, however, it loses standing as a legitimate policy statement.

Such a denigration of 2(c) has taken place over the past 2 months as Presidents have claimed an "inherent" right to use military forces to rescue American citizens. And Members of Congress, including me, have publicly acknowledged this right. Yet, subsection 2(c) states that in the absence of a declaration of war or a statutory authorization the President can commit U.S. forces to battle "only pursuant to . . . a national emergency created by attack upon the United States, its territories or possessions, or its Armed Forces."

When I questioned Senator Javits as to whether the words "only pursuant" were meant to exclude the right to rescue, he conceeded that they did. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my colloquy with Senator Javits on this subject on October 10, 1973, be printed in the RECORD.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See exhibit 1.)

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President the President's right to introduce U.S. forces to rescue endangered citizens was thoroughly debated during consideration of the Senate war powers bill. While American case law was not particularly convincing one way or the other, historical precedent and international laws governing the use of force strongly supported the citation of such an emergency power. And there was little controversy over the provision in the Senate since the legislation carefully circumscribed the President's actions. The Senate considered the right to rescue to be a logical extension of the President's responsibility to "repel sudden attacks."

It is clear from the recent cases and from the Senate debate on war powers that Congress recognizes the traditionally exercised right of the President to rescue endangered Americans. It is also clear from the Senate war powers bill and from the recent action taken in both Houses on the Vietnam evacuation bill that Congress wants to carefully circumscribe the President's unilateral action. The amendment I am introducing today will satisfy those two considerations. More importantly, it should enhance the integrity of the resolution's policy section by making it all-inclusive.

This amendment carefully circumscribes the President's action by requiring him to determine:

First, that the citizens to be rescued are being involuntarily held with the express or tacit consent of the foreign government; second, that there is a direct and imminent threat to the lives of such citizens; third, that the foreign government in question either cannot or does not want to protect these individuals; and fourth, that the evacuation take place as expeditiously as possible and with a minimum of force.

These requirements trace the guidelines established in international law for the rescue of a nation's citizens endangered and without protection in another country. Waldock, in "The Regulation of the Use of Force by Individual States in International Law," cites the right to protect nationals abroad and states:

". . . The landing of forces without consent, being unmistakably a usurpation of political authority, is prima facie intervention. The question is whether it is an intervention which is justifiable as an exceptional measure of self-protection. That must depend on whether it satisfies the principles laid down in the Caroline incident. There must be (1) an imminent threat of injury to nationals, (2) a failure or inability on the part of the territorial sovereign to protect them and (3) measures of protection strictly confined to the object of protecting them against injury. Even under customary law only an absolute necessity could justify an intervention to protect nationals. But, where such necessity existed, intervention seems to have been legally justifiable in the period before the Covenant."

Mr. President, the emergency powers of the President, even if only defined as a matter of congressional policy, should be all-encompassing. There is today, with one or two notable exceptions, a consensus that the right to rescue is inherent in the Commander in Chief. Even those who would not concede that such a right is inherent would probably agree that Congress, as a practical matter, should delegate the power to cover such emergencies while at the same time carefully circumscribing his possible actions. The amendment I propose today would satisfy those objectives.

I would like here to add a contemporary note concerning powers the President might possess to use force without prior congressional approval. These powers to the extent they exist, are strictly defensive in nature, deriving from the assumed power of the President to repel sudden attacks on the Nation, its forces or its citizens when endangered abroad. Under no circumstances should a President take offensive action of a punitive or retaliatory nature without the express approval of Congress.

At this point Mr. Stevenson assumed the chair.

Mr. EAGLETON. In this regard, I have read press accounts of the military operation employed to rescue the crew of the Mayaguez. Leaving merit completely aside, I am disturbed by reports that punitive action unrelated to the rescue itself might have been taken against Cambodia. If, for example, the bombing of Ream Airport and port facilities at Sihanoukville—bombing which took place a half hour after the crew of the Ma-aguez was safely aboard the Wilson—was unrelated to the need to protect U.S. forces, then the President, in my opinion, exceeded his authority under the Constitution and violated specific prohibitions against combat activity in Indochina. I have asked the General Accounting Office today to investigate this possibility.

The Mayaguez incident also afforded an opportunity to assess the effectiveness of the consultation provision of the war powers resolution. This provision states: "The President in every possible instance shall consult with Congress before introducing United States Armed Forces into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances, and after every such introduction shall consult regularly with the Congress until United States Armed Forces are no longer engaged in hostilities or have been removed from such situations."

It is clear now that little if any real consultation took place prior to the Mayaguez military operation. At most a number of Senators and Congressmen were notified or informed of action already planned or underway. As I understand the procedure employed by the White House to satisfy the consultation provision, no opportunity was given to Congress to provide advice prior to the introduction of forces.

This confusion over the word "consultation" should not exist. Definitions of the word have been established in case law and the standard dictionary meaning leaves little doubt that to "consult" is to seek advice.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a number of legal definitions of the word "consultation" be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. EAGLETON. The second amendment I propose should clear up any confusion as to the intent of Congress in this area. My amendment would replace the phrase "consult with Congress" in section 3 with the words "seek the advice and counsel of Congress." So that there can be no misunderstanding as to what this phrase means, I have included a definitional section stating that the President "shall discuss fully the proposed decision for using—the Armed Forces" with designated Members of Congress. I am hopeful that this amendment will assure that, even in emergency situations when the President is operating within his constitutional powers, Congress view will be represented and considered prior to the introduction of forces.

The third amendment I propose today is one that I presented during consideration of the Senate war powers bill. The purpose of the amendment is to assure that the war powers resolution does, in fact, cover all possible uses of force by the President. The amendment would circumscribe the President's use of American civilian combatants in the same manner uniformed Armed Forces are currently circumscribed by the law.

Under this amendment a President would be bound to report the engagement of American civilians, either directly or as advisers, in a hostile situation within 48 hours.

Mr. President, we have heard much in the past months about the covert activities of the Central Intelligence Agency—of the hiring of contract employees to advise foreign military forces—and of the use of contractors to engage in dangerous missions when the use of American uniformed personnel might be politically prohibitive.

It is time to recognize that American involvement in hostilities cannot be obscured by semantics. If we become involved in combat to pursue a policy objective other than the emergency defense of the United States, its forces or its citizens, then Congress should authorize that involvement. Either we are involved in hostilities or we are not involved. And that should be the operating principle of the war powers resolution.

The potential for use of covert civilian forces by a President to achieve military objectives is currently restricted only by the imagination of man.

We have already seen CIA personnel used as pilots and combat advisers. And if we fail to pass this amendment, we may see an even more wide-ranging use of civilian combatants in lieu of uniformed personnel whose activities will be circumscribed by the reporting provisions of the war powers resolution.

I believe it is time for Congress to acknowledge the vast potential available to the President to expand his warmaking options beyond the scope we have thus far envisioned by using civilian combatants. Congress can protect its prerogatives by assuring that the war powers resolution covers this possibility.

Mr. President, we have learned much from our experience in Vietnam and we have continued to learn as the exigencies of the contemporary Indochina situation have forced us again to use military force in that region. As we look more dispassionately at President Ford's use of force in the past 2 months, I am hopeful that Congress and the President can work together to improve the decisionmaking process. As the late Alexander Bickel often asserted—

"There is no assurance of wisdom in Congress, and no such assurance in the Presidency—The only assurance there is lies in process . . ."

Mr. President, much can be done to improve the process by which we go to war. I am hopeful that the Senate will consider carefully the amendments I have introduced today which are intended to make the war powers resolution a more utilitarian mechanism for protecting Congress unique power to declare war.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a Library of Congress memorandum entitled "Interpretation of War Powers Resolution" which refers to the legal status of subsection 2(c) of the resolution, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERPRETATION OF WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

This is in response to your request whether §2(c) of the War Powers Resolution, P.L. 93-148, 87 Stat. 555, is a binding restraint upon the exercise of the President's powers. That section provides:

"The constitutional powers of the President as Commander in Chief to introduce United States Armed Forces into hostilities, or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances, are exercised only pursuant to (1) a declaration of war, (2) specific statutory authorization, or (3) a national emergency created by attack upon the United States, its territories or possessions, or its armed forces."

Questions are raised because of a paragraph in the conference report on the Resolution, H.Conf. Rept. No. 93-547, 2 1973 U.S. Code Congressional and Administrative News 2364, stating:

"Section 2(c) is a statement of the authority of the Commander-in-Chief respecting the introduction of United States Armed Forces into hostilities or into situations were imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances. Subsequent sections of the joint resolution are not dependent upon the language of this subsection, as was the case with a similar provision of the Senate bill (section 3)."

The heading of § 2 of the Resolution is headed "Purpose and Policy." The general understanding of such policy sections, or preambles as they were frequently known in older legislation, is that they "state the reason or occasion for making a law or to explain in general terms the policy of the enactment. . . . The function of the preamble is to supply reasons and explanations and not to confer power or determine rights." 1A Sutherland's Statutory Construction, §§ 20.03, 20.12 (4th ed. 1972). Preambles customarily preceding the enacting clause, while in modern legislative practice the use varies.

In any event, the language of the statute, as clarified by the legislative history to reveal legislative intent, if resort to it is necessary, is determinative and axions of statutory construction are only useful guides. Upon consideration of the statute as a whole, including the placement of § 2(c) under its particular heading and the failure to refer to it in subsequent sections clearly meant to have binding effect, and further upon consideration of legislative history, which is instructive in this respect, it appears that Congress meant § 2(c) only as a, to use the conference committee's word, "statement" of its understanding of the scope of presidential powers and that the sections of the Resolutions which impose binding obligations are not structured in terms of the limitations set out in this "statement."

That is, while § 2(c) sets out a limited number of instances affording the President the constitutional power to use United States troops, the provisions of the Resolution require the President to consult with Congress prior to any introduction of troops into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is indicated (3) and, to report to Congress any introduction of troops into hostilities or imminent hostilities, absent a declaration of war (§ 4), and provide for time limitations and congressional actions with regard to any commitment of troops. While, therefore, the President in Congress' understanding may only use troops under certain circumstances, any commitment of troops qualify under the Resolution is subject to it provisions. Congress has seemingly constructed a system by which it may require extraction of United States forces without regard to the constitutionally of the President's action in the first place.

This construction is supported by the legislative history. The Senate bill, S. 440, 93rd Congress, also contained a § 2 headed "Purpose and Policy," setting forth the view that the constitutional balance of the war powers had been disturbed and needed redressing. In § 3 of the bill it was provided that "[i]n the absence of a declaration of war by the Congress, the Armed Forces of the United States may be introduced . . . only" and there was set out four situations, including the repulsion of an armed attack, the protection while evacuating United States citizens in situations of danger abroad, and pursuant to specific statutory authorization. Thereafter each section of the bill, requiring reporting, setting the period off commitment, providing termination dates, and setting forth congressional procedures was specifically tie 1 to § 3. Thus, § 4, the reporting section began: "The introduction of the Armed Forces of the United States . . . under any of the conditions described in section 3 of this Act shall be reported promptly . . ." Language identical to that in italic appeared in each section.

On the other hand, the House bill, H.J. Res. 542, 93rd Congress contained no such language. It provided simply for the reporting of the committing of United States troops, termination dates, and congressional action with regard to any commitment of troops coming within the specifications, in language basically similar to that in § 4(a) of the Resolution as adopted.

The version reported by the conference committee was therefore close to the original House version, with the principal exception that § 2(c) was included and the conference report, as quoted, makes clear that it does not qualify the sections following on it. In debate on the conference report in the Senate, Senator Eagleton opposing, Senator Javits defending, this construction is the one urged by the former and accepted, not without some qualification, by the latter. 119 Cong. Rec. S18, 992-S18,995 (daily ed. Oct. 10, 1973).

This construction, therefore, would leave unsettled the basic question of the balance of powers as between Congress and the President, while Congress would have claimed to itself the power to override any Presidential action after a stated period and would have in effect claimed the power to make sure that any extended use of United States troops abroad would be pursuant either to a declaration of war or to some form of lesser specific statutory authorization.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Oct. 10, 1973]

Mr. EAGLETON. First, Mr. President, let me ask this of the distinguished Senator from New York, who is not only the initial author of S. 440, but manager of the bill on the floor, a conferee, a former attorney general of New York, and a distinguished lawyer: With respect to this word "only" in section (2)(c), he has laid great emphasis on the word "only," the Senator said the Presidential powers are only, pursuant to this section, used to react to emergencies such as an attack upon the United States, its territories, and its possessions.

I take it that the Senator's current position is that under the Constitution the President has no emergency authority with respect to American nationals endangered abroad.

Mr. JAVITS. I said no such thing. I said—

Mr. EAGLETON. The Senator emphasized the word "only."

Mr. JAVITS. I understand. I said "is exercised only." That takes in what we understand the current situation to be and what we are willing to accept is the current situation.

I would tell the Senator this: There was a very long argument about including the concept of rescuing nationals. It was felt that whatever was specified on that score, in order to be conservative in respect of the President's power, would have to be so hedged and qualified that we were better off just not saying it, in view of the fact that it is a rather rare occurrence, and just leaving that open; and that is what we did.

Mr. EAGLETON. Then I take it, from that answer, that the word "only" is interpreted to mean "more or less only"?

Mr. JAVITS. No; only means only, and sometimes in life something is so de minimis in terms of its occurrence or likelihood, and the President can always come to us for authority—

Mr. EAGLETON. Does the Senator mean to say that the rescue of American nationals in danger abroad is de minimis?

Mr. JAVITS. He can always come to us for authority if he is in any doubt.

Mr. EAGLETON. I ask the Senator, as a respected constitutional lawyer, in his view does the President have or does he not have authority to act unilaterally to rescue American nationals in danger abroad who might be found in the midst of rebellion or the threat of war?

Mr. JAVITS. I think the normal practice which has grown up on that is that it does not involve such a utilization of the forces of the United States as to represent a use of forces, appreciably, in hostilities so as to constitute an exercise of the war power or to constitute a commitment of the Nation to war. The Constitutional Convention spoke only of "repelling sudden attacks."

Mr. EAGLETON. With all due respect, Mr. President, I find that incredible. The Dominican Republic—Lyndon B. Johnson's memorable adventure—was that action not predicated on emergency authority to rescue American citizens in Santo Domingo?

Mr. JAVITS. It may have been so predicated, but I do not think it was justified. Any President, so long as the Army, Navy, and Air Force will obey him, can seek to assert authority which may not be justified under constitutional law. We could not help that even if we passed the Senate bill as the conference report. He would still do the same thing.

Mr. EAGLETON. I take it, then, by the word "only," on which the Senator laid great emphasis, that "only" means only, truly, honestly only?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

MAJOR DIFFERENCES BETWEEN KEY OPERATIVE PROVISIONS OF THE SENATE WAR POWERS BILL AND THE CONFERENCE REPORT

1. Prior authority: The Senate bill carefully enumerated the President's emergency powers in explicit language. It cited three emergency situations into which the President could commit troops: an attack on the U.S. or its possessions, an attack on American forces legally deployed abroad, and the rescue of American nationals abroad. Only in these situations was the President given prior limited unilateral authority to deploy troops (for a 30-day period). The House bill simply required the President to consult and report with Congress when U.S. forces were committed pursuant to his understanding of his powers (for a 120-day period). The divergence in these two basic approaches, the so-called authority versus performance tests, proved to be the undoing of the Act in my opinion. The Conferees settled on language similar to an authority test but, tragically, placed it in a meaningless "Purposes and Policies" section of the Act that is totally without effect.

2. Automatic cutoff provision: The Senate bill allowed troops deployed under the Act to remain so deployed only for 30 days unless Congress acted to authorize a further deployment. The Conferees settled on a 60-day period (with an additional 30 days for safe disengagement). The practical effect of this compromise, taken together with the gutting of the prior authority provision outlined above, was to permit Presidential war to be waged for 90 days.

3. Rescue of American citizens abroad: The Senate bill provided prior authority to the President to use troops to rescue Americans in danger abroad, a Presidential prerogative that has been upheld by the courts. The Conferees dropped that provision.

WAR AND PRESIDENTIAL POWER

(By Thomas F. Eagleton)

CHAPTERS 11 AND 12

The House-Senate conference committee [1] on war powers legislation was convened the last week of July. Senator Javits graciously asked that his staff assistant keep me informed of developments in the conference negotiations. The conferees met once before the long August recess, mainly to identify contentious issues and to get acquainted with each others' views. Although both sides were said to be courteous and accommodating, the dispute over prior athority sharply separated them, and it appeared that they were in for several months of debate.

Before the conference committee's next meeting, a position paper was prepared by Senator Javits and sent to each conferee. It was an excellent legal memorandum and expressed serious reservations about the House bill. "The House text appears to be predicated on the assumption that the President will continue unilaterally to commit the Armed Forces to hostilities . . . without a declaration of war or prior specific authorization of the Congress." This assumption was challenged as a distortion of the Constitution. "Clarification of the underlying issue of authority is the essence of meaningful war powers legislation, for in recent years Presidents, in practice, have virtually monopolized the exercise of the war powers of the nation." I thoroughly agreed with Senator Javits' analysis.

But the House side was not going to submit peaceably. The House conferees prepared a rebuttal to the Senate position, which I received on September 18. The House seemed to accept literally the executive branch argument on the question of authority. In doing do, it rendered moot the "necessary and proper" clause, which enables Congress to legislate within the intent of the Constitution. "Even if the 'necessary and proper clause' is given its broadest construction, the House conferees said, "it is difficult to see it giving Congress the right to define the powers of the President. . . . [H.J. Res. 542] takes as granted that the Presidents will act on what they perceive to be their legitimate powers granted by the Constitution, or powers which they infer have been given them by past Congressional actions."

But the cardinal point was that we had been faced with a succession of Presidents who had boldly exercised their power to the exclusion of any congressional right to initiate war. The only leverage available to Congress under these circumstances was to use its power to legislate. The executive branch and the House conferees, however, believed that his power, found in the "necessary and proper" clause of the Constitution, should be forsaken.

On September 25 Senator Javits' assistant sent over a text of a counterproposal Senator Javits intended to make the following day "for the purpose of preserving the minimum essentials of the Senate position respecting the authority issue . . ." The key language defined the authority of the respective branches in the initiation of war:

"The emergency powers of the President to introduce the United States Armed Forces into hostilities or situations likely to lead to hostilities being to (1) repel attacks upon the United States, its territories and possessions; (2) defend the United States Armed Forces abroad from attack; (3) rescue citizens and nationals of the United States; in any case in which the United States Armed Forces without a declaration of war by the Congress, or specific prior statutory authorization are introduced."

Following this statement were the procedures to be observed after entry into emergency hostile action. It was a minimally acceptable compromise from my standpoint, for although it was weak in circumscribing the President's power to rescue American citizens in danger abroad, it contained no reference to a "forestall" power, and that was potentially worth the trade-off. Most importantly, the congressional prerogative to authorize hostilities except in limited emergencies would have been preserved. If the House accepted the proposal, we would be well on the road to sending the bill to the President.

The conference committee staffs met frequently the following week, and the conferees convened again on October 3. By evening, they were close to agreement. When House Conference Chairman Zablocki left the meeting, he put his thumb and forefinger close together and said jubilantly, "We're only this far apart." The next morning the Washington Post reported that a "tentative agreement" had been reached, and that "the President would be authorized to take military action against foreign nations without the advance consent of Congress in certain emergency situations, but he would have to come back to Congress and obtain its express consent to continue the action beyond 60 days." (Emphasis added.) This was the general formula of the Senate bill, and while I was unsure what definition of the President's emergency powers had been used, I was pleased by what I read.

Senator Javits' staff assistant called that morning elated that the fundamental principles of the Senate bill had been preserved. Senator Javits had even insisted that the legislative language emphasize that the President could initiate action without prior congressional consent "only pursuant" to the emergency categories listed in the bill.

Then I obtained a draft copy of the bill. It contained a significant surprise. The authority provision was no longer under the "Reporting" section, it was now a part of a "Purpose and Policy" clause of the bill along with other general pronouncements of legislative intent. The authority languange, found under Subsection 2(c) of the "Purpose and Policy" clause, seemed specific enough, authorizing only a limited range of presidential action. The addition of the word "only" seemed to make the clause even more restrictive. But why put the most important provision in a "Purpose and Policy" section, a section usually reserved for broad statements which are used for interpretive purposes in resolving questions relating to other sections? In this context it didn't seem possible that Subsection 2(c) was intended to be governing language, as was the case in the Senate bill. It didn't even track well with the provisions that followed. Something wasn't quite right and I asked my staff to thoroughly research the draft bill.

The conference report was by now printed, and it left little to the imagination. The key sentence describing the authority provision in Subsection 2(c) read as follows: "Subsequent sections of the joint resolution are not dependent upon the language of this subsection [referring to Subsection 2(c)], as was the case with a similar provision of the Senate bill." There was no longer any doubt about the conferees' intent. They were explicitly divorcing the interpretive definition of the President's emergency authority in the "Purpose and Policy" section from the legally binding portions of the bill. The authority language was not only not legally binding, but now even its value as a statement of policy was questionable.

What had finally been agreed to in conference did not simply water down the bill; it turned the Constitution on its head. By failing to define the President's powers in legally binding language, the bill provided a legal basis for the President's broad claims of inherent power to initiate war. Under the formula, Congress would not participate in the warmaking decision until after forces had been committed to battle. No specific congressional consent was required for ninety days (the bill called for congressional approval before sixty days but the President could simply certify that "unavoidable military necessity respecting the safety of U.S. Armed Forces" required their continued use to extend his unilateral power for thirty more days). Congress could act by concurrent resolution to withdraw his authority at any time, but the fact remained that Congress could act only after the troops were deployed. Rather than tying the President's hands—as the White House surprisingly claimed—the bill would tie Congress' hands.

A disclaimer was added to the bill stating that it was not "intended to alter the constitutional authority of the Congress or of the President," but this was a meaningless statement since the judicial branch had historically refused to rule on challenges of authority by one branch against another when Congress had failed to pass a statutory definition of that authority. In addition, a provision was included to assure that a President could not cite the bill itself as statutory authority. But he had no need to cite the bill, since the only authority cited by recent Presidents was an "inherent" power derived from the commander-in-chief clause of the Constitution. Such a claim was improper and unconstitutional in my opinion, but no court would challenge it. It was a "political" question.

In brief, the conference bill was a dangerous piece of legislation which, if enacted, would effectively eliminate Congress' constitutional power to authorize war. It did contain the automatic cutoff provision, but Congress had been notoriously incapable of stopping a conflict once the flag had been committed. Once a battle is underway, the commander in chief controls the flow of vital information; the reins of power, political and military, are in his hands. Under these circumstances, it was unrealistic to expect a majority of Congress to oppose U.S. participation in an ongoing war, especially during the first weeks and months of the conflict when the President monopolizes public opinion. After all, it took nine years after the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution for Congress finally to stop the most unpopular war in our history. And that only after the troops had been withdrawn! If the conference bill passed, Congress would, for the first time, be surrendering its war powers by legislation.

12. Surrender

After three years of work, I now, sadly, had to oppose a war powers bill that would almost surely go to the President. It was not a decision that I relished.

Before speaking against the bill on October 10, I yielded time to Senator Barry Goldwater, who had been the staunchest opponent of the original Senate bill. Goldwater consistently held that Congress could not constitutionally restrict the President's actions, either before or after troops are committed to battle. But now he put forward an unexpected thought: "This conference report, Mr. President, I could probably actually vote for, because it gives the President even broader powers than the authors of the original bill thought they were correcting." I asked Goldwater to elaborate.

"Mr. EAGLETON. Did I correctly hear the Senator say that in some respects he even considered voting for the measure, because this bill as presently drafted gives the President greater powers to wage one-man war than he had before?

"Mr. GOLDWATER. I would not vote for it under any circumstances.

"Mr. EAGLETON. I commend the Senator.

"Mr. GOLDWATER. But I do think that from the conference report, for example, it appears to me that the President is no longer prohibited from initiating original actions. He needs only to report during the first 60 days.

"Mr. EAGLETON. The Senator is precisely correct.

"Mr. GOLDWATER. This language puts into the law language that is not contained in the Constitution, but only assumed to be there because of the delegation of Commander-in-Chief powers to the President. If I were looking for a reason to change my mind, that would be it.

"Mr. EAGLETON. I agree with the Senator completely on that point."

I later told the senator that I hoped all one hundred of our colleagues had read the bill as carefully as he had.

And so we reached the beginning of the end. As debate opened, I conceded that the conferees must have had a hard time negotiating the authority issue, since both sides "marched down separate and distinct roads. . . ." Nonetheless, the final product was "a near-total abrogation of the Senate position on war powers." The authority provision contained under the "Purpose and Policy" section was "no more binding than a 'whereas' clause in a Kiwanis Club resolution." I then read what I considered the most telling sentence in the conference report, the sentence stating that subsequent sections of the bill were "not dependent upon" the authority provision. "If I were arguing a case to a jury of 12 good men," I said, "I would probably rest my case on that one sentence." The conference bill was "worse than no bill at all," and I tried to explain why:

"It fails to address directly the question of just what authority the President has to engage our forces in hostilities without the approval of Congress. It is of questionable constitutionality in that it creates a 60-to-90-day period of Presidentially declared war, in derogation of the war powers conferred by the founders on Congress. And it creates a legal base for the continuing claims of virtually untrammeled Presidential authority to take the Nation to war without a prior congressional declaration.

"[The bill's] practical effect would be to enshrine, to make permanent by statute, the President's current misuse of power through a procedure which seeks only to limit that misuse rather than to prohibit it altogether."

Senator Javits disagreed with my interpretation that Section 2(c), the authority section, was nonbinding language and sought to disavow the perplexing definition of that section in the conference report: "There is nothing in the managers' report that makes the legislative history exclusively or which binds the Senate only to those confines. I am just as much a manager . . . as the managers of the House."[2] If the senator could successfully divorce himself from the conference report he signed, then his contention that the definition of authority in Section 2(c) was legally binding might seem credible. He persisted with his central point, that the entire bill had equal legal force: "If this is a statute, every part means something, whether it is written in Section 2(c) or in Section 3, as in the Senate bill."

The issues were joined. Was Section 2(c) legally binding? Was the Senate bound to the "confines" of the sentence in the conference report stating that subsequent sections of the bill were "not dependent" on Section 2(c)? Could Senator Javits disavow the conference report he signed? The answers to these questions would only come clear in debate:

"Mr. EAGLETON. . . .with respect to section 2(c), . . . the Senator realizes and has stated in his remarks that language relating to emergencies was in the operative section of the Senate bill, S. 440. Is that not correct?

"Mr. JAVITS. I do not agree with the Senator as to the definition of the "operating section." I think every section of this bill is operative, including the declaration.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

"Mr. JAVITS. So I cannot accept the fact that the Senator chooses to make his own definition as to what is operative.

"Mr. EAGLETON. The Senator realizes, does he not, that it is an established legal doctrine? I have one "hornbook"[3] here—I could quote the Senator a hundred—that a preamble or a policy section is:

"To supply reasons and explanations and not to confer power or determine rights. Hence it cannot be given the effect of enlarging the scope or effect of a statute."

"Is that not pretty standard, garden variety legislative law?

Mr. JAVITS. But nonetheless this is a statute, and every word in the statute, in my judgment, has equal effect, no matter what took place at the head of the column; in this case it is "purpose and policy."

"Mr. EAGLETON. Did not the conferees on the House side, the Zablocki side, fight very vigorously to keep it out of the operative sections and put it in the purpose and policy sections?

"Mr. JAVITS. 'The operative sections' is strictly the Senator's definition. What they fought was making the touching-off point for the number of days the question of authority rather than the question of performance, and upon that, as I have stated before, we had to give ground, and we did.

"Mr. EAGLETON. I have one other question, and then I shall yield to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, and then after that I shall have some concluding remarks of my own.

"The Senator, in his presentation, said something to this effect—and I want to get it straight—that we are not to pay any attention to the managers' report; is that the gist of it?

"Mr. JAVITS. No.

"Mr. EAGLETON. The Senator signed the managers' report?

"Mr. JAVITS. I signed the report of the conferees. That does include the managers' report. We do not sign, as I understand it, the managers' report per se. The signatures appear at the end of the measure.

"Mr. EAGLETON. The signatures appear both at the end of the bill and at the end of the managers' report.

"Mr. JAVITS. That is right."

At this point, Senator Marlow Cook came over and whispered, "The Vice President has just resigned." The galleries were buzzing with the news and senators were coming to the Chamber seeking more information. Spiro T. Agnew, the thirty-ninth Vice President of the United States, had just pleaded nolo contendere to a charge of income tax evasion and had been given a suspended sentence of one year and a ten-thousand-dollar fine.

When order was restored, the debate continued with more discussion of the report and the conferees' responsibility for it. Senator Javits now argued that he was not trying to disavow the report, he was elaborating on it. But a subsequent judicial review would refer only to the bill and its conference report. Senator Javits' elaboration could not be accepted as the official congressional definition of the provisions.

Having exhausted that topic we went back to the bill itself. Despite the compromise with the House, was it still an effective control over presidential power? Senator Javits thought it was:

"Mr. JAVITS. . . . I say to the Senator from Missouri, as one of its original sponsors and one of the stalwarts with respect to the bill, let us not miss the forest for the trees. The fact is that never in the history of this country has an effort been made to restrain the war powers in the hands of the President. It may not suit my colleague 100 percent, but it will make history in this country such as has never been made before.

"Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, . . . we are not here to make history. We are here to make law. We are here to make important law, the most important law that can be made by man on this earth; namely, when to go to war—how, why, and when to go to war. . . . The fact is, we have a War Powers Act. It is what it says. That is important, not the title and not even the length of time that has gone into the making of the bill, as long as that has been. That is important, yes. But what is truly vital is how this Nation goes to war and what this bill says, not what the . . . intent of the Senator from New York was when he managed the bill on the floor of the Senate, but what this bill says now after it has come back from conference.

"Yes, I helped to give birth to the Senate bill three years ago, but the child has been kidnapped. It is no longer the same child that went into the conference. It has come out a different baby—and a dangerous baby, Mr. President. Because this bill does not go one inch in terms of restricting the unilateral war-making of the President of the United States.

"Try as he may, and able lawyer that he is, the Senator from New York cannot get around the language of the statute. He cannot get around the fact that the purpose and the political effect of section 2(c) is "nothing." Noble in concept but worthless in execution. He cannot get around the fact that the managers' report of both houses said as much when it said that subsequent sections of the joint resolution are not dependent on the language of section 2(c). The managers went so far as to say, "We want to show you this is not the Senate bill." So they took that out. . . . What we have here today is a 60- to 90-day open-ended blank check which says, "You fight the war for whatever reason, wherever you want to, Mr. President." That is what we are legislating here today."

The conference bill passed the Senate, 75–20. Few senators were in the chamber to hear the full debate; some, I later learned, assumed that the original Senate bill was fundamentally intact. The comments of senator after senator were directed at the original Senate bill rather than the conference bill. The change made by the conference committee seemed minor to most, a technically, not important enough to change long-held positions. But without a legally binding delineation of authority, "the essence of meaningful war powers legislation," in Senator Javits' words, had been sacrified. The President's claim of inherent power to initiate war would be given the color of legality.

On October 12, the House passed the conference bill by a vote of 238–123 and the war powers resolution went to the President for the expected veto.[4] A number of congressmen repeated arguments similar to mine before voting against the bill. But of the appropriately thirty members previously opposed to the Indochina War who voted against the original House bill, only half opposed the new bill. Were the changed votes the result of satisfaction with the conference bill? Or did they reflect a growing resolve to defeat Richard Nixon on something?

On Saturday, October 20, the President's political stock hit a new low. After refusing for months to provide the grand jury investigating the Watergate matter with tape recordings of his conversations with key figures in the affair, he devised a plan to have Senator Stennis review the tapes personally and endorse a summary which would be given to the Court. When Archibald Cox, a former Harvard law professor of mine who had been appointed as special prosecutor in the case, learned he would have to cease his pursuit of the tapes and other key documents, he publicly announced his refusal to accept the President's compromise. That Saturday night the President asked Attorney General Elliott Richardson to fire Cox. Richardson resigned instead. When Deputy Attorney General William Ruckelshaus refused to fire Cox, he was fired. Solicitor General Robert Bork then fired Cox and the "Saturday-night massacre" was over. But in the week ahead the demand for impeachment came from all corners of the country and the House Judiciary Committee

[2] "Managers' report" and "conference report" were used interchangeably during the debate, as were the words "managers" and "conferees."

[3] A "hornbook" is a law-school textbook which summarizes the study of case law.

[4] The White House had long before publicly announced that the President would veto either the House or Senate bill.

began to seriously consider the question. There were fewer and fewer congressmen who wanted to be identified as supporting the President, especially on a separation of powers dispute.

The anger and dismay over the precipitious firing of Special Prosecutor Cox had not yet subsided on October 25, when President Nixon vetoed the war powers resolution. Called H.J. Res. 542 unconstitutional, he charged that it would "seriously undermine this Nation's ability to act decisively and convincingly in times of international crisis." There was nothing new in the message. The President was accustomed to operating in an extraconstitutional fashion, and any apparent restriction of his warmaking powers, even though his board claim to initiate war was left untouched, was unacceptable. It didn't seem to matter that the bill would not stop the President from beginning a war single-handedly. That generous grant of authority would be acknowledged later, but now the President was complaining about an attempt to tie his hands ninety days after committing American forces to battle.

House advocates of the war powers resolution put on an major drive to secure the votes of those few dissident doves who had voted against the conference bill. A two-thirds majority was needed to override the veto. The pressure was on to defeat Richard Nixon and, ironically, the key swing votes were the President's most dedicated opponents. The New Republic and the St. Louis Post Dispatch opposed the conference bill, but most other national publications supported it editorially. The political forces, were pulling strongly to override the veto. The rather dry legal arguments put forth were not making much headway. The President had vetoed eight bills in the Ninety-third Congress and eight times Congress failed to override him. It was an embarrassing record for the Democratic leadership, which was under fire in the media. The war powers vote would be its best chance yet to begin to even the score.

The override vote in the House took place on November 7. Newsweek magazine called it a tense scene with high-pressure lobbying carried on by both sides. The President himself called a number of key congressmen. The leadership leaned on those Democrats who claimed that the bill extended the President's powers. "This is no time to support Nixon," they said. Only seconds before the final tally a small group of liberals switched their votes in favor of the override. The final vote was 284-135. The House overrode the veto by four votes. One of the liberals who reluctantly switched her previous vote was Congresswoman Bella Abzug. She reflected the attitude of many:

"Until today, Congress has not been able to override any Presidential veto in this session. But today's vote comes at a time of revulsion of the people against the crimes and corruption in this administration. . . . This could be a turning point in the struggle to control an administration that has run amuck. It could accelerate the demand for the impeachment of the President."

The bill then came immediately before the Senate and I went to the chamber to urge my colleagues to reject it. As I came onto the floor, a respected senior senator called me aside and said, "Tom, we wish you would keep quiet on this vote. We simply have to slap Nixon down and this is the vote to do it on." I said that I could not keep quiet about a bill that gave the President more power than the Constitution bestowed upon him. It was, to say the least, an awkward confrontation.

I glanced toward the press gallery and began my speech: ". . .the media coverage of the bill still says that [it] limits the President's war powers. It does not. The bill gives the President unilateral authority to commit American troops anywhere in the world, under any conditions he decides, for 60 to 90 days. . . ."

Many senators understood this, but thought that the provisions allowing Congress to stop a war by a majority vote were worth the sacrifice. I again tried to make the point that Congress had been conspicuously reluctant to stop the President after American forces were committed to battle. I related a 1969 conversation with the late Senator Richard Russell of Georgia:

"In one of the early days after I had come to the Senate, I was seated, having lunch, in the little dining room where Senators sometimes dine. I was so new that I sat at the head of the table by mistake. I sat in the chair that, by custom, was reserved for the late Senator Richard Russell, of Georgia. No one told me to the contrary. Senator Russell came in to eat. He took another chair, he being the very fine gentleman that he was. Finally, somebody winked at me and told me I was in the wrong place. So I traded chairs, but I sat next to Senator Russell.

"Somewhere in the conversation, the discussion turned to war, how we get into it, and how hard it is to get out of it. It perhaps is not very well known, but Senator Russell had personal misgivings in the sense of why we were there and what national security interests were being served by our massive presence there.

"But he said:

" 'Whatever misgivings I had about that war—and I counseled with President Eisenhower about it in the early days; I counseled with President Kennedy about it; and I counseled with President Johnson about it—whatever misgivings I had, whatever doubts I had, so long as our flag is committed and our troops have been sent, I have got to support those troops and I have to support the flag when the decision is made.'

"That was what Senator Russell told me. He was a very wise man, one of the wisest ever to serve in this body. Those words of his are better than any that I could summon. Once the commitment has been made the die is cast."

Javits and Muskie seemed more intent on demonstrating that the bill would not overly restrict unilateral presidential action than on what it would do to Congress' role. They sent a "Dear Colleague" letter to all senators, which had been printed in the Congressional Record the day before. The letter referred to an October 6 outbreak of fighting in the Middle East. When a temporary cease-fire between Israeli and Arab forces broke down, the Soviet Union threatened to send ground forces to reimpose it. President Nixon reacted with a worldwide alert bringing our military forces to the brink of war. He never did commit them to battle, but the near-confrontation was an apt backdrop for the war powers debate. In their letter, Javits and Muskie used this situation to show how the war powers bill would work:

"Nothing in the war powers resolution could have hampered the President in his handling of the recent Middle East crisis. The bill would have allowed the President to put our armed forces on alert, to order movements of our fleets and to resupply the Israelis with military equipment. The bill would have required the President only to report to the Congress within 48 hours with respect to the deployment of U.S. Armed Forces in foreign territory, airspace and waters. (Emphasis added.)"

Senator Javits, who had earlier argued that the bill would not permit the President to introduce forces into battle without prior congressional consent, appeared in the letter to contradict himself. He explained the contradiction this way: ". . . nothing in the war powers resolution could have hampered the President in his handling of the recent Middle East crisis. . . . Of course, if he had introduced our forces further than he did . . . the bill would have and should have been operative."

Nevertheless, the important question remained: How would the bill operate? What would the President be required to do under its provisions? Javits contended that the President would be circumscribed by the knowledge that Congress could step in and stop him within ninety days. He would have to "take his chances" if his action was not legally correct, Javits argued. I addressed this contention in my summary argument:

"If this becomes law we have given a predated declaration of war to the President and any other President of the United States, courtesy of the U.S. Congress. This is not a question of the President taking his chances. The chances he will be taking are our chances, our country's chances, chances with life and death.

"What the President should do, in the mind of the Senator from New York, is to come to Congress. What does the bill provide? I served at one time in the Missouri Legislature. We had a member of the house there at one time get up and say, 'I see what the bill say, but what do it do?' What does this bill do?

"Section 2(c) is nonoperative and nonenforceable, not only by its policy section but by the very interpretation in the managers' report which was signed by the chief sponsors of the legislation, the Senator from Maine (Mr. Muskie) and the Senator from New York (Mr. Javits). They said in that report very clearly what section 2(c) did not do. It is here on page 8 of the manager's report.

"The chance the Senator from New York is willing to have the President take is the chance to deploy our forces to a hostile area. And the President, under this measure, could deploy those troops in Israel, Syria, Egypt, Chile, Bangladesh, or wherever he wanted, tomorrow. There is a 60-day period but the troops are there. They are deployed, being shot at, dying, and the flag is committed. . . .

"That is not what the Constitution of the United States envisaged when we were given the authority to declare war. We were to decide ab initio, at the outset, and not post facto.

"This is no historic moment of circumscribing the President of the United States insofar as warmaking is concerned. This is an historic tragedy. It gives to the President and all of his successors in futuro, a predated 60-day unilateral warmaking authority. All the words spoken here today cannot change what this law does, and what it does is wrong."

But the train had already left the station, powered by the notion that an override would be a rebuke of the President. One senator came up to me after the debate and said, "I heard your argument. I agree with you. I love the Constitution, but I hate

Nixon more." Another said, "You were right as a matter of policy. But what you failed to recognize was that this had become a symbolic issue insofar as the public's perception of limiting the President's warmaking."

So the President was defeated, symbolically, 75–18. Sam Ervin and Jim Abourezk, who both opposed efforts to legislate in the war powers area, were the only other Democrats to vote with me to sustain the veto. Congress had answered the President's usurpation of its most solemn power by legitimizing it. The enactment of the war powers bill was the culmination of an era of congressional surrender.

On November 9, I wrote to Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and asked him for the State Department's legal interpretation of the newly enacted law. The debate over the meaning of the legislation was a tangle of contradictory assertions. The only practical way to expose the real effect of the bill, short of actually going to war, was to ask how the executive branch would implement its provisions. Would the President feel legally constrained by the definition of his emergency authority contained in the "Purpose and Policy" section of the bill?

The answer came prematurely and unexpectedly in an Associated Press bulletin reporting the comments of Secretary of Defense James Schlesinger at a November 30 press conference. I read the bulletin as it came over the wire service ticker near the Senate floor:

"WASHINGTON (AP).—Defense Secretary James Schlesinger said today war powers legislation passed by the Congress may make it possible for President Nixon to order new bombing in Indochina in the event of a new major North Vietnamese offensive in South Vietnam.

"Though indicating he would likely oppose the idea, Schlesinger said the State Department is examining such a possibility.

"The war powers legislation he referred to would give Nixon the authority to send U.S. forces into combat abroad for sixty days before Congressional authorization had to be obtained.

"The bill became law over President Nixon's veto earlier this month."

It was now plain that the administration was reading the War Powers Resolution for what it was, an undated declaration of war. It was an unconstitutional delegation of congressional war powers, but in the context of continuing usurpations of these powers, the President would be the last to protect Congress from its own legislative formula. The ninety-day grant of authority would apparently be taken at face value, to be used to augment the increasingly discredited presidential claims to initiate war unilaterally.

The War Powers Resolution was a blank check to be used as legal tender for claims of inherent executive power, but according to its provisions it could not be used as "specific authorization." It could not, therefore, be used to supersede the Church-Case provision in the State Department authorization bill stating that no funds may be expended for combat activity in Indochina "unless specifically authorized hereafter by Congress." Secretary Kissinger publicly conceded this point the following week, but by then it was quite clear how the administration would implement the War Powers Resolution in areas of the world where specific restrictions did not apply.

On December 1, I received the State Department's response to my request for a legal interpretation. "It is the Department's opinion that Section 2(c) does not constitute a legally binding definition of the President's Constitutional power as Commander-in-Chief," the letter stated. "Section 2 does not contain language which requires or prohibits any particular action. . . ." The department was still studying the implications of the operative sections of the bill (calling for consultation, reporting, and congressional authorization to continue a war beyond ninety days), but whether or not the President decided he would abide by those legally binding sections or challenge them as unconstitutional, his State Department clearly saw the bill as a ninety-day open-ended grant of authority.

How did it happen? How could Congress formalize its surrender to executive power in the warmaking area in the immediate aftermath of a tragic presidential war? I have given that paradox considerable thought but have no final answer. Had Congress lost confidence in the Constitution and the institutional mechanisms created by that document? There is a pervasive feeling that principles espoused by the founders simply don't apply to the modern age. The New York Times reflected this attitude in its November 8 editorial acclaiming the enactment of the War Powers Resolution:

"The war powers bill itself is not the revolutionary measure that Mr. Nixon and other critics have attempted to make it out to be. It does not in any way curtail the President's freedom, as Commander in Chief, to respond to emergency situations. If any thing, it gives the Chief Executive more discretionary authority than the framers of the Constitution intended in order to deal with modern contingencies that they could not have foreseen."

Life has changed since the time of the founders, but the necessity for deliberation and collective judgement is, if anything, more important today. In 1787, the most likely threat to the United States was the British fleet storming the east coast. In the 1970s the American military presence is everywhere. War could break out involving any of the more than two thousand military installations overseas, and war could begin with the push of a button. We continue to require a commander in chief who can act expeditiously to "repel sudden attacks," but we require more than ever a responsible Congress to decide when national "interests" and "commitments" should lead to war. If the experience of Vietnam has taught us anything, it should have taught that the choice between war and peace is best left to the collective judgement of Congress and the President. There is no guarantee of perfection in such a system, but it is infinitely safer than one man acting alone. The admonition of Supreme Court Justice Joseph Story in 1833, is still relevant today:

"The power of declaring war is not only the highest sovereign prerogative; but it is in its own nature and effects so critical and calamitous, that it requires the utmost deliberation, and the successive review of all the councils of the nation."

Implicit in the argument that Congress cannot perform its function of declaring war in the modern world is the frustration over Congress' inability to step in and take over for a weak President in other areas. Congress is comprised of 535 members. It can never be as dynamic and decisive as the one man to whom the great powers of the presidency are assigned. But the founders understood that the line between dynamism and arrogance, between decisiveness and tyranny, is a precariously thin one. They purposely devised a deliberate, diverse, and accessible body that would subject the most important questions facing us to the scrutiny of collective judgment. Much can be done to improve the process of deliberation, but progress will be slow if Congress misunderstands its own fundamental role.

The primary resonsibility of the legislature in this instance is to declare war, not stop it after it has begun. Congress is at a distinct disadvantage in trying to terminate a conflict over the objections of the commander in chief.

The founders could not have anticipated the contingencies of a modern America, but they were studied in the arrogance of excessive power and they knew well how to limit it. I suspect that if Hamilton and Madison and Jefferson could be brought back to view contemporary America, they would be less alarmed by the modern tools of mass destruction than by the erosion of the constitutional means they created to control their use.

Many have grown cynical over the failure of Congress to curb presidential power. If this book feeds that cynicism, its message has been missed. I labored to enact war powers legislation, because I believed that the intent of the Constitution could be recaptured by statute. It can still be done, but it will require a wider conviction that the system can work. It will require faith in law over the transitory desires of politicians. And it will require a keener awareness by the public that the most important decision a free society makes is the decision to go or not to go to war.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 70—RELATING TO THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE UKRAINIAN FAMINE OF 1932-33

Mr. HOLLINGS (for himself and Mr. DOMENICI) submitted the followng concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 70

Whereas more than seven million Ukrainians in the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, one of the member republics of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, died of starvation during the years 1932-1933;

Whereas the famine was the consequence of deliberate policies of the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics aiming to destroy the political, cultural, and human rights of the Ukrainian people, and the economic, social, and political consequences of this famine are still manifest among the Ukrainian population;

Whereas the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, although fully aware of the famine in the Ukraine and having complete control of the entire food supplies within its borders, nevertheless failed to take relief measures to check the famine or to alleviate the catastrophic conditions resulting from it, and, furthermore, ignored the appeals of international organizations and other nations; and

Whereas intercessions have been made at various times by the United States during the course of its history on behalf of citizens of other countries who are oppressed or persecuted by their governments, indicating that it has been the traditional policy of the United States to take cognizance of such invasions of human rights and liberties: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress hereby condemns the systematic disregard for human life and for human rights and liberties that characterizes the policies of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, expresses sympathy for the millions of victims of such policies, and urges the President—

(1) to proclaim May 28, 1984, as a day to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the introduction of the original resolution by Congressman Hamilton Fish in the House of Representatives which focused attention on the Ukrainian famine;

(2) to call, through public and diplomatic channels, the attention of the world to the policies of the Government of the Soviet Union which caused the slow death by famine of seven million Ukrainians during 1932 through 1933 and to other similar policies of the Government of the Soviet Union; and

(3) to urge the Government of the Soviet Union to remove current restrictions on the shipment of food parcels and other necessities to Soviet citizens by private individuals and charitable organizations.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the President.

FAMINE IN UKRAINE

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, when the Soviet Union destroyed a commercial Korean airliner with its 269 innocent civilians on board, we were all shocked. But we should not have been surprised.

Today, I join with my good friend, the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI) in introducing a resolution which commemorates another Soviet atrocity—one which must be counted as one of history's great genocides. Fifty years ago, over 7 million Ukrainians died a horrible, lingering death during 1932 and 1933 in the first artificially engineered famine the world has known.

The purpose of this coldblooded extermination was to break the backbone of the peasantry in the drive to collectivize agriculture and to destroy all vestiges of Ukrainian nationalism, as expressed in the culture, industriousness, productivity, and pride of the Ukrainian people. Similar devastation was visited on the independent-minded Don and Kuban Cossacks and the Volga Germans. Recent Soviet statistical work leads to the conclusion that in the longer period between 1926 and 1937, at least 14 million people died during collectivization. The only harvest in what was known as the breadbasket of Europe, was that of death, and it was collected in the name of the lofty ideals of Russian Communist hegemony.

All grain was confiscated by the state, and most of it—4 million metric tons—shipped to Europe. Livestock perished, and not even seeds remained for future sustenance. Cannibalism was not unknown as starving villagers, fleeing their homes, were turned back at gunpoint to their prisons of hunger. Those who resisted were shot or exiled. The rest starved to provide an economical solution to the nationality problem. No assistance, domestic or international, was permitted, and in the West, the cries of the famine's victims were muffled as Western journalists, enamored of the romance and promise of the Russian revolution, remained largely silent about its unspeakable toll in human rights and human life.

Mr. President, it is time to break the silence and recognize the enormity of what occurred in the Ukraine at that time. We must also understand it as a clear and brutal expression of Soviet behavior and policies which, in fundamental aspects, have changed little in over half a century. A government willing to exterminate an average of over 10,000 of its own people a day does not hesitate to kill another 269 for reasons of state or whim. A sober awareness of the motivations and values informing Soviet behavior is an absolute requirement for all aspects of an effective U.S. policy toward the U.S.S.R., including disarmament talks.

On May 28, 1934, Congressman Hamilton Fish introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives decrying the suffering of the Ukrainian people and calling on the Soviet Union to alter its policies and alleviate the terrible consequences of the famine. Our resolution urges the President to designate May 28, 1984, the 50th anniversary of congressional recognition of the tragedy, as a day to commemorate the great Ukrainian famine. It also calls on the President to focus world attention on the famine through public and diplomatic channels and to urge the Soviet Government to lift restrictions on food parcels and other necessities sent to Soviet citizens by private individuals and charitable organizations.

Our resolution is a demonstration of solidarity with the Ukrainian Americans who are observing the 50th anniversary of the tragedy this year. It is offered as an expression of moral outrage and sympathy for the 7 million Ukrainians who starved to death, and for the millions of other individuals of other nationalities who have died for Soviet reasons of state.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from South Carolina, Mr. HOLLINGS, in sponsoring this resolution commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Soviet manmade famine in Ukraine. In the period 1932-33, an estimated 7 million Ukrainian men, women, and children lost their lives in a manmade famine in Soviet Ukraine, a fertile country often called the granary of Europe.

In an effort to break the will of an independent-minded and nationally conscious Ukrainian peasantry, and to secure collectivization and insure industrialization, the Soviet regime, under Stalin, ordered the expropriation of all foodstuffs in the hands of the rural population. The grain was shipped to other areas of the Soviet Union or sold on the international market to finance the Government's rapid industrialization program. In the years 1932-34, while the famine was taking place, the Soviet Union exported more than 4 million metric tons of grain.

Peasants were ordered to turn all grain over to the state. Those who refused were deported or executed. Without food, without grain, without seeds, the peasants began to starve. Within months, millions of men, women, and children were dead or dying. Soviet authorities even went so far as to establish border checkpoints to prevent the starving from entering the Russian Republic and prevent anyone from Russia bringing food into Ukraine.

Stalin saw the famine as the "final solution" in his attempt to eradicate the independent spirit of various nationalities in the Soviet Union. Ukrainians, the largest non-Russian nationality in the Soviet Union, represented an impediment to Moscow's plans to create a centralized and Russianized Soviet state. Not coincidentally, famine also ravaged the territories inhabited by the Don and Kuban Cossacks, and Volga Germans. These people were also viewed as posing serious threats to the Soviet regime's ambitions.

It is ironic that the most recent Soviet atrocity of shooting down an unarmed civilian aircraft occurred as Ukrainian-Americans are commemorating the 50th anniversary of the manmade famine. Just as 269 innocent people died on September 1, 1983, an average of about 10,000 Ukrainian men, women, and children died every day in 1932 and 1933 in history's only man-induced famine.

Just as the Soviets at first denied shooting down the Korean Air Liner and then defended their action, the Soviets denied the existence of the famine and then, when the evidence was overwhelming, defended their action. Nothing has changed in Soviet behavior during these past 50 years. The brutal murder of 269 people a month ago was not a mistake or an aberration but the policy of the Soviet Union just as the murder of 7 million Ukrainians 50 years ago, the invasions of the Baltic States, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Afghanistan, the subjugation of Eastern Europe, and other atrocities were also Soviet policy.

Mr. President, the famine in Ukraine has been described as the "holocaust the West forgot." It took place at the same time that the United States was extending recognition to the Soviet Union and many in Government did not want to upset the newly developed relations. Many Western correspondents stationed in Moscow refused to report the famine and, in some cases, denied that it existed. In a recent interview for Canadian television, Malcolm Muggeridge, who was stationed in Moscow for the Manchester Guardian at that time, stated that too many Western correspondents allowed their ideological sympathy for this new "world order" to interfere with their obligations as journalists. To his credit, Mr. Muggeridge did report the events at that time as did the Hearst chain of newspapers.

Former Congressman Hamilton Fish introduced House Resolution 399 on May 28, 1934, condemning the Soviet engineered famine in Ukraine. In an interview on September 18, 1983, Mr. Fish stated that of all the tragedies and holocausts of this century, the famine in Ukraine was the worst because it entailed a slow death with much suffering.

Mr. President, I join with my Ukrainian-American friends in commemorating this tragic event in their history and the history of the world. The death of 7 million innocent people is difficult to comprehend but we must never let it be forgotten. Through this resolution, the United States can help focus attention on this "forgotten holocaust."

REMEMBERING THE UKRAINIAN FAMINE

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, the history of the world is scarred by the seemingly endless acts of inhumanity committed by one individual, group or nation against another. Most recently, citizens of this Nation and the world were shocked by the Soviet Union's brutal destruction of a civilian airliner, resulting in the tragic loss of 269 innocent lives.

This week, we mark the anniversary of another human tragedy. Fifty years ago, the world witnessed the starvation of millions of Ukrainians—victims of history's only man-induced famine.

Mr. President, 50 years ago this month, the normally bountiful fields of the Ukraine were filled with the stench of death and decay. This devastation was not caused by any natural catastrophe. It was an entirely new phenomenon—history's first manmade famine.

To achieve his goal of rapid industrialization, Stalin had decreed the focible collectivization of agriculture and the adherence to rigid, unrealistic quotas. When the collectivized farms in the "breadbasket of Europe," the Ukraine, were inevitably unable to meet their quotas, the farmers were accused of such crimes as stealing, sabotage and hoarding. Stalin, in an attempt to crush all vestiges of Ukrainian national sentiment, ordered all the food be confiscated, leaving the Ukrainian peasant families to face certain death by starvation.

The resulting famine eliminated a substantial segment of the U.S.S.R.'s on-Russian population, thus insuring that the Soviet Union would remain for the next five decades a state dominated by an absolute Russian majority. At the height of the famine, the Soviet authorities continued to deny that a famine existed, refused international assistance, and increased its grain exports. Reliable figures indicate that 7 to 14 million peasants died as a result of this manmade disaster.

Mr. President, 50 years seems to me too long a time to remain silent about one of the greatest crimes in the history of mankind. In commemorating the anniversary of the famine this week, Ukranian Americans do this country and the world a great service. For only by recalling the painful memories of the past can we hope to insure that history does not repeat itself.

SENATE RESOLUTION 233—RELATING TO THE COMMON AGRICULTURAL POLICY OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Mr. DIXON (for himself, Mr. HELMS, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. PERCY, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. DOLE, Mr. BOREN, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. JEPSEN, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. WILSON, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. BENTSEN, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. SASSER, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. COHEN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. QUAYLE, and Mr. TRIBLE) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 233

Whereas the Commission of the European Community has proposed modifications to the European Community's Common Agricultural Policy (CAP);

Whereas the CAP proposals announced by the Commission call, among other things, for restrictions on imports of nongrain feed ingredients, including corn gluten feed and citrus pellets, and for a consumption tax on vegetable oils and fats, including soybean products;

Whereas United States exports to the European Community in 1982 totaled over $4 billion of soybeans and oilseed products and nearly $700 million of corn gluten feed and other nongrain feed ingredients, representing over 50 percent of United States agricultural exports to the European Community and over 10 percent of total United States farm exports;

Whereas the European Community has bound in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) that it will impose no import duties on soybeans, soybean meal, corn gluten feed, and citrus pulp, and such zero tariff bindings were agreed to in return for United States trade concessions to the European Community during earlier rounds of trade negotiations;

Whereas the Administration has expressed deep concern and disappointment in the proposals for CAP modification advanced by the Commission and has declared its strong opposition to the adoption of any measures calling for new restrictions on United States exports to European Community markets;

Whereas the adoption of proposed CAP modifications by the European Community would impair access of United States agricultural products to the European Community markets and would shift the financial burden of needed CAP adjustments from the Community to other nations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) the President should urge the Council of European Community Ministers to reject the proposals of the Commission that seek to shift to other countries the financial bruden of disposing of European Community agricultural surpluses;

(2) the President should continue to vigorously oppose any of the proposed CAP modifications that would adversely affect access of United States agricultural exports to the European Community markets; and

(3) if the European Community adopts any of these proposed CAP modifications, strong measures should be implemented immediately to protect the legitimate trade interests of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of the resolution to the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the United States Trade Representative.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, today I am submitting, along with 30 of my distinguished colleagues, a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate concerning the adverse effect on U.S. agricultural exports of proposals to modify the common agricultural policy of the European Economic Community.

Mr. President, I would have hoped that a resolution of this type would not be necessary, but with the proposals to modify the common agricultural policy now being considered by the European Economic Community, it seems there is no choice. Decades of cooperation are now being challenged by the proposed tax on vegetable oils and fats, and the import restrictions on nongrain feed ingredients.

This resolution is straightforward and to the point. First, it asks the President to communicate with the Council of European Community Ministers, urging them to reject the proposals of the Commission, which seek to shift to other countries the burden of disposing EC agricultural surpluses.

Second, the resolution asks the President to vigorously oppose any of the proposed cap modifications that would adversely affect our access of agricultural exports to the EC.

This resolution also expresses the sense of the Senate that strong measures should be implemented immediately to protect the legitimate trade interests of the United States if the proposed cap modifications are adopted.

This issue is of great importance to the American farmer and to the citizens of the United States. It is of great importance to my own State of Illinois, which is the No. 1 State in the production of soybeans and in agricultural exports.

In 1982, nearly half of the U.S. $8.4 billion in soybean and soybean product exports were exported to the EC, where they entered duty-free. If the proposed tax on fats and oils is implemented, we will lose much of the EC soybean and soybean product market.

The United States exported less than $200 million of soybean and soybean products to the EC when the zero binding for soybeans and soybean meal was negotiated in 1962. Because imported soybeans and soybean meal are exempt from EC duties, and are less expensive, European feed manufacturers have increased the soybean meal share of processed products.

The use by the EC of soybean oil, which is processed from imported soybeans, has increased in salad oil, cooking oil, and margarine. Soybean oil competes with locally produced EC olive oil and butter.

The EC is proposing to use a discriminatory tax on fats and oils instead of discontinuing the use of import barriers and lowering minimum internal price guarantees. The revenue generated by the tax would be used to fill the depleted coffers of the EC treasury to continue to support their present agricultural policy. By taxing fats and vegetable oils at a higher rate than olive oil, and imposing no tax on butter, the effect would be to reduce the use of soybean oil which would also have a similar effect on soybeans and soybean meal.

The net effect of this proposal would be a loss of soybean and soybean meal exports by the United States. This would correspond to a reduction in price to the more than 600,000 American soybean farmers.

In addition to the consumption tax on vegetable oils, which is being contemplated by the EC, there is also under consideration some form of import restrictions on nongrain feed ingredients including corn gluten feed and citrus pulp. This proposal is contained in the EC discussion of reforms in the cereals program. The Commission calls for "a rapid and effective limitation of imports" of these ingredients.

A limit on imports of corn gluten feed by the EC would violate longstanding GATT agreements and threaten a $500 million per year U.S. export market without materially affecting the internal grain support problems faced by the EC.

Around 3 million tons of corn gluten feed are exported to the EC annually for use as protein ingredients in feeding livestock. Under GATT rules, these imports, as well as the import of a number of other protein materials, are bound duty-free under agreements reached during the Kennedy round of multilateral trade negotiations.

Corn gluten feed is one of many products used by European animal feeders as protein supplements. Restrictions on its import will not result in a concurrent increase in the amount of EC-produced grains which are fed to livestock. Further, since corn gluten feed exports are only a small part of the total amount of nongrain feed ingredients used by EC animal feeders, other major ingredients, such as soybean meal, could face similar threats in the future when restrictions on corn gluten feed fail to have a material impact on the EC grain situation.

Mr. President, it is imperative that the U.S. Senate be on record objecting to the potential threat by the Commission of the European Economic Community that would further restrict our access to the EC market.

We should make our position clear and the best way to do this, is to adopt this resolution. I urge my colleagues to join with me in taking this important, and necessary, step.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues in submitting the resolution relating to the common agricultural policy of the European community.

Modifications of the common agricultural policy have recently been proposed by the EC commission that will effectively restrict agricultural imports to Europe to protect the domestic agricultural economies of EC members. If adopted by the Council of Ministers of the European Community, the modifications will create real problems for U.S. farmers.

The resolution expresses the sense of the Senate that the U.S. Government should vigorously oppose the cap modifications and, if they are adopted, take appropriate measures to insure that our trade interests are protected.

EXPORT MARKETS

U.S. farmers are in financial trouble. Following 2 years of disastrously low prices, this year the farm economy is being adversely affected by the drought and a continuation of the weak demand in export markets.

During fiscal year 1982, the value and volume of U.S. farm product exports declined for the first time in 13 years. Export volume declined by 2 percent from the previous year, and the value of these exports fell 11 percent. The Department of Agriculture forecasts that U.S. farm exports may decline further in this fiscal year.

In the 1970's, our agricultural exports grew fivefold. However, from 1981 to 1983, they have declined about one-fifth, from more than $44 billion in 1981 to a projected total of $34.5 billion in 1983.

We must reverse this trend, and to do so, we must protect the ability of the United States to sell its products abroad.

The proposed modifications of the cap—a consumption tax on oils and fats, and restrictions on imports of corn gluten feed and similar feeds—jeopardize our export sales to a major market. In 1982, the United States exported over $4 billion of soybean and oilseed products, and nearly $700 million of corn gluten feed and other nongrain feed ingredients, to the EC. In total, U.S. agricultural export sales to the EC amount to almost one-quarter of all U.S. agricultural export sales.

Further, the proposed action will effectively abrogate the EC's commitment under the GATT accords not to impose import duties on soybean products and corn gluten feed.

While we ought to strive for free trade throughout the world, looking toward the elimination of tariffs and trade barriers of all sorts, it is becoming increasingly clear that other nations, at the present time, do not support the concept of free and fair trade.

I do not think the United States should sit back and allow its producers to be put at a disadvantage by the practices of other countries that unfairly reduce opportunities for the sale of agricultural products.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, the costs to governments and consumers of protectionist policies are great. Further, such policies distort patterns of trade and divert resources from better economic uses. No one gains from such inefficiencies and the list of those who are hurt is long.

I am hopeful that the council of ministers of the European Community will reject the proposals of the Commission. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution that makes clear the position of the Senate in this regard.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, this resolution is a signal that the U.S. Congress will not stand idly by as export markets are taken from U.S. farmers.

The Commission of the European Community has proposed several changes in the EC's common agricultural policy, and some of these proposed changes would adversely affect U.S. agricultural exports. The United States should adamantly oppose such proposals, which will restrict vital markets for American farmers—particularly producers of corn and soybeans.

I commend our distinguished colleagues from Illinois, Senators DIXON and PERCY, the distinguished ranking minority member of the Agriculture Committee, Senator HUDDLESTON, and the other cosponsors of this resolution for their leadership on behalf of American agriculture.

Specifically, we are concerned about two measures: restrictions on imports on nongrain feed ingredients such as corn gluten feed and citrus pellets, and a consumption tax on vegetable oils including soybean products. If these measures are imposed, U.S. farmers will lose a valuable outlet for their commodities and derivatives of those commodities.

Corn gluten is a by-product of the corn milling industry. It is exported from the United States to the EC as a low energy, fibrous, medium protein feedstuff which is used in dairy and beef cattle rations in Europe.

In 1982, the U.S. exported $437 million worth of corn gluten feed and meal to the 10 EC member nations. Restrictions on these shipments would deprive American farmers of valuable markets.

Pelleted citrus pulp is another type of nongrain feed ingredient exported to the EC. In total, the U.S. exports about $700 million of nongrain feed ingredients to the EC every year.

In a sense, these proposals are not new. Several times in recent years some member states of the European Community have proposed such measures. As recently as April 15, 1982, the Senate adopted a resolution objecting to an earlier EC proposal for restrictions on corn gluten feed. In fact, such restrictions could adversely affect related industries in certain European countries, and they were not implemented by the EC.

However, there is renewed impetus behind the proposals. Although they would likely be rejected individually, there is a chance that these restrictions could be implemented as part of a more comprehensive package.

The uneconomic results of the common agricultural policy have escalated the costs of EC agricultural programs to the limits of their resources, and changes in these programs could well occur.

In June of this year, the heads of state of the EC member countries met in Stuttgart to discuss their budget problems. They directed the EC Commission to prepare proposals for controlling the cost of EC agricultural programs. The Commission's proposals were published July 29, 1983. Another summit meeting of EC heads of state is to occur in Athens in December.

As a result, Mr. President, this resolution is especially timely. There should be no mistake on the part of the Europeans how seriously we view these restrictions.

In all fairness, Mr. President, it should be noted that there are some elements of the EC proposals which appear to be commendable. For example, the EC has vaguely proposed some constraints on milk production and a "more restrictive" price support policy, which would be constructive and responsible adjustments. However, these proposals are quite unspecific and do not appear to provide the real restraints which are needed on EC subsidies and surpluses.

It is true that the EC remains a major purchaser of U.S. agricultural commodities, but that is no excuse for the existing trade policies in Europe. In fact, the growth in trade has occurred despite the Common Agricultural Policy—not because of it—in those commodities which are not subject to the EC's variable levy. During the decade of the 1970's, U.S. exports of nonlevy items to the EC increased at almost twice the rate of levied imports.

Now the EC is proposing to further expand these costly and restrictive levies. If these new proposals were to be accepted, EC restrictions on agricultural imports would then cover virtually all major products. We must not let free trade be shut out entirely.

American farmers cannot afford to have these markets taken away from them. Last year the U.S. exported over $4 billion worth of oilseeds and products to the EC, including $2.8 billion worth of soybeans and nearly $900 million worth of soybean cake and meal.

North Carolina farmers produced nearly $300 million worth of soybeans in 1981, which represents 7 percent of all farm cash receipts in our State. Not only is the crop economically important, it is one which represents a classic example of successful free enterprise.

The rapid advance of the U.S. soybean industry has predominantly occurred apart from Government commodity programs, in contrast to other crops. During the last 40 years, demand for high protein soy products has increased and U.S. farmers have responded to the market incentive by increasing production dramatically. Soybean production increased from 5 million bushels in 1925 to over 2 billion bushels last year.

At the same time, Government programs and controls for soybeans are very limited. Soybean growers have requested that soybeans maintain their traditional freedom from Government regulations by not being included in any farmer-owned reserve, land diversion, or acreage reduction.

Soybean price supports are set as a percentage of recent year's market prices, so as to keep U.S. soybeans competitive in world markets. In terms of protection from low prices or natural disaster, soybeans growers have generally taken the initiative upon themselves to use marketing strategies or otherwise protect themselves through the private sector, rather than using the Government. Reserves of soybeans are entirely held by farmers and industry in the private sector, without a frame-work of Government storage payments and controls. This encourages individual initiative, is more efficient than Government controls, and is less costly to the taxpayers.

The industry has already been active on trade-related matters. On April 6, 1983, the National Soybean Processors Association submitted a petition to the U.S. Trade Representative seeking relief from unfair foreign trade practices.

In short, the soybean industry has not asked for much from the U.S. Government. Surely the least we can do is to support the soybean industry in its efforts to keep our world markets free. That is vitally important, not only to corn and soybean farmers, but also to the future of a free and fair world trading system.

Mr. President, Secretary Block has responded to the EC proposals in a firm and timely fashion. I ask unanimous consent that an excerpt of Secretary Block's statement before the American Soybean Association be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT

I am deeply concerned and disappointed to learn that the Commission of the European Community has proposed to restrict imports of corn gluten feed and impose a tax on vegetable oils as part of an effort to solve its farm budget problems.

We have not had time to examine in detail the proposals made public by the Commission on Friday, but it appears that once again the EC is ready to deal with its internal problems by transferring a major part of the burden of adjustment to other countries.

Despite years of intense debate on these same issues—during which we have made it abundantly clear that we are opposed to any action affecting our access to the EC market—the EC is again proposing to restrict imports of corn gluten feed and to impose a tax on vegetable oils.

The result of these proposals would be to expand EC restrictions on agricultural imports to cover virtually all major products.

These are drastic policy decisions; we are gravely concerned, and we will make our concerns known to EC officials in detail as we undertake a complete review of the proposals.

In this process, we will be very clear on one essential point: Should the EC take, action to apply new restrictions on our trade, this would leave us no other choice but to consider whatever counter measures are necessary to defend our legitimate trading interests.

SENATE RESOLUTION 234—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. McCLURE, from the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, reported the following original resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 234

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 672, to amend the Reclamation Safety of Dams Act of 1978 to authorize additional appropriations, and for other purposes. S. 672, as reported, authorizes the enactment of new budget authority which would first become available in fiscal year 1984.

The waiver of section 402(a) of such Act is necessary to permit Congressional consideration of S. 672. Such bill was not reported on or before May 23, 1983, as required by section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for such authorizations.

The likelihood that the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources would report such a legislative initiative was reflected in its March 1983 report to the Committee on the Budget pursuant to section 301(c) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974. Therefore, the Appropriations Committee of the Senate has had adequate notice of this authorization. Enactment of S. 672 is not expected to interfere with or delay the appropriations process.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

EXPORT ADMINISTRATION ACT AMENDMENTS

GARN AMENDMENT NO. 2237

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. GARN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 979) to amend and reauthorize the Export Administration Act of 1979; as follows:

On page 53, after line 9, insert the following:

REPEAL OF LIMITATION ON EXPORT CONTROL AUTHORITY

SEC. 19. The last sentence of section 812 of the Agricultural Act of 1970 (7 U.S.C. 612c-3) is repealed.

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, the Senate will soon be turning to the consideration of S. 979, the Export Administration Act Amendments of 1983. That bill contains a provision that would require the President to repect the sanctity of existing contracts at the time of the imposition of new foreign policy export controls. Such protection is currently provided under law only with regard to agricultural exports.

I do not believe that it is either fair or wise to give one sector of the economy protections unavailable to other sectors. This situation is remedied by the contract sanctity provision of S. 979, which would apply its protections to all sectors of the economy. With this more adequate contract sanctity provision in S. 979, it is appropriate to delete the contract sanctity provision for agriculture alone that was added to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission legislation last Congress. I am today introducing an amendment to S. 979 that would make that change, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.●

"(B) 8/13 of the amount which would otherwise be so established in the case of an individual in an 8-week benefit period; and

"(C) 6/13 of the amount which would otherwise be so established in the case of an individual in a 6-week benefit period.

"(4) Any State which chooses to allow extended benefit periods in accordance with this subsection shall provide that any individual eligible for extended compensation solely by reason of this subsection may decline eligibility for such compensation, and for purposes of the State's plan under part A of title IV of the Social Security Act such compensation shall not be considered to be available to such individual. Any choice to decline eligibility for such compensation shall terminate any rights to such compensation.

"(5) The provisions of this subsection shall apply only to calendar quarters beginning on or after October 1, 1983, and ending on or before March 31, 1985.".

such individual's eligibility for additional weeks of compensation by reason of the amendments made by this Act shall not be limited or terminated by reason of any event, or failure to meet any requirement of law relating to eligibility for unemployment compensation, occurring after the date of such exhaustion of rights and before October 1, 1983 (and the period after such exhaustion and before October 1, 1983, shall not be counted for purposes of determining the expiration of the two years following the end of his benefit year for purposes of section 602(b) of the Federal Supplemental Compensation Act of 1982).

HOUSING AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

HEINZ AMENDMENT NO. 2254

Mr. BAKER (for Mr. HEINZ) proposed an amendment to the joint resolution (H.J. Res., 366) to provide for the temporary extension of certain insurance programs relating to housing and community development, and for other purposes, as follows:

At the end of the joint resolution add the following:

SEC. . That section 8 of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945 is amended by striking out "September 30, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "October 31, 1983".

COMMERCE, STATE, JUSTICE APPROPRIATIONS, 1984

PRESSLER AMENDMENT NO. 2255

Mr. PRESSLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 3222) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and State, the Judiciary, and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes, as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill insert the following: The Administrator of the Small Business Administration is hereby directed to ensure that all funds appropriated for the veterans direct loan program are disbursed.

VIETNAM VETERAN DIRECT LOAN PROGRAM

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I am introducing an amendment to H.R. 3222, which funds the Small Business Administration (SBA) and other agencies. My amendment will direct the Administrator of the SBA to insure that all funds appropriated for its Vietnam veteran direct loan program are disbursed.

As one of the 22,000 South Dakota Vietnam veterans, I am well aware of the difficulties our servicemen and women face on their return to civilian life. This worthwhile program was intended by the Congress to provide Vietnam veterans with loans to help them establish or expand small businesses.

Vietnam veterans from South Dakota and other States have complained that the SBA is being less than cooperative in making these loans. In fact, of the $25-million appropriated for this program in fiscal year 1983, only $3 million in loans were given out. As a result, the Appropriations Committee has recommended that the program be funded for 1984 by carrying over the remaining $22 million from 1983.

The administration opposed this program from its inception. But the Congress has made its support quite clear, and it is not the job of the SBA to thwart that decision. I believe the Congress should send a strong signal to the SBA that their lack of cooperation should not continue. I hope my colleagues will join me in supporting this much needed amendment.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

SECRETARY JAMES WATT

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, several days have passed since Secretary of the Interior James Watt made his famous remark.

It has been amazing to me how many people have charged into the situation. These people do not understand the importance of the Department of the Interior being run by a man with Western orientation. Of equal interest is how these Members of Congress, who so vociferously are calling for Watt's resignation have made similar slips of the tongue. I do not think there is a one of us who has not from time to time said, "Oh I should not have said that, I wish I could call it back." I remember, for example, the time that President Jack Kennedy called the presidents of the steel companies, "SOB's." Now, frankly, that is a far worse statement than the one that Jim Watt used.

I do not, for one instant, condone what the Secretary said, nor do I think it proper, nor would I defend it, in fact, I would not even defend his right to say it. The fact is, however, James Watt has been an exceedingly fine Secretary of the Interior. Oh, he may not please everyone who lives in parts of the country not touched by the Interior Department, particularly, those people who want to see the West stay as the West was, when the first explorers went that direction. However, to those of us who live in that area of the United States, Secretary Watt has been a good Secretary and, in my opinion, he has done a very good job and I do not want to see him quit and I would be quite upset with the President if he even suggested that he resign.●

NOTIFICATION OF A CROSSWALK CHANGE FOR THE RESERVE FUND

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, pursuant to section 2(c) of the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1984 (H. Con. Res. 91), I hereby report to the Senate on behalf of the Committee on the Budget an adjusted allocation to the Committee on Finance under section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act. The details of this adjustment are contained in the following letter from the Committee on the Budget to the Committee on Finance, which I ask be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, D.C., September 28, 1983.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Chairman, Committee on Finance, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is to advise you of an adjustment in the spending totals allocated to your Committee under the First Budget Resolution for fiscal year 1984 (H. Con. Res. 91). This adjustment is made pursuant to section 2(c) of the First Budget Resolution dealing with reserve programs.

In accordance with section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act, the budget authority and outlay totals in the First Budget Resolution were allocated among the committees of the Senate. These allocations, contained in the statement of managers accompanying the conference report on the First Budget Resolution, excluded amounts set aside in a budget reserve for identified new initiatives in domestic programs.

Section 2(c) of the First Budget Resolution provides that the amounts in the budget reserve are to be allocated to the appropriate committees of the Senate upon enactment of authorizing legislation or at the point the Senate proceeds to consider entitlement or other direct spending legislation. The programs in the budget reserve and the amounts in the reserve fund for each program are set forth in the statement of managers accompanying the conference report on the First Budget Resolution.

Your Committee has reported and the Senate will shortly proceed to consider S. 1887, a bill that includes an extension of federal supplemental compensation benefits for the unemployed, one of the programs contained in the budget reserve. Accordingly, the section 302(a) allocation to your Committee under the First Budget Resolution is hereby adjusted as follows:

[Dollars in millions]

	Fiscal year 1983		Fiscal year 1984
	BA	O	BA	O
Direct spending jurisdiction:
Original committee allocation [1]	$409,060	$389,550	$426,162	$412,088
Adjustment for Federal supplemental compensation benefits for the unemployed			1,500	1,500
Adjusted committee allocation	409,060	389,550	427,662	413,588
Entitlements funded in annual appropriation acts:
Original committee allocation	50,408	56,303	52,863	52,929
Adjustment for Federal supplemental compensation benefits for the unemployed			1,500	1,500
Adjusted committee allocation	50,408	56,303	54,363	54,429

[1] Includes technical corrections transmitted to the Committee on July 19, 1983.

The adjustment for the federal supplemental compensation program reflects the amount for that program in the reserve fund.

Sincerely,

PETE V. DOMENICI,
Chairman.●

KARL ARMSTRONG, 1927-83

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, a very important Alaskan died on September 11 at age 56, after a painful bout with cancer. Karl Armstrong, a lifelong resident of Kodiak, Alaska, was extraordinarily active in Kodiak affairs, as publisher of the Kodiak Times and executive vice president of Koniag, Inc., the regional Native corporation.

Born on Woody Island, Karl attended the University of Alaska at Fairbanks, where he began his newspaper career as editor in chief of the university paper. After graduation, he went to work for the Anchorage Daily News, first as a reporter then as city editor.

Karl returned to Kodiak in 1957 to work for the Kodiak Daily Mirror and eventually became chief editor. The 1964 earthquake forced the temporary closing of the Daily Mirror, so Karl started his own paper, the Kodiak Marine Pilot, and later in 1976, established the Kodiak Times.

Karl is remembered not only for his enormous energy, but for his willingness to stir people up when he felt something had to be done. I can give Karl Armstrong no better eulogy than to quote his friends and colleagues:

The courage of his convictions combined with a puckish sense of humor to keep things in perspective—[and] served him well in his unending efforts on behalf of this community. He was first, last and always an advocate of whatever he felt was best for Kodiak, for the fisheries, for the Native people. He was a colorful, controversial character whose shoes will not easily be filled.

In Native affairs, also, Karl was tireless. In 1972 he joined the staff of Koniag, the regional Native corporation. He served as its director of natural resources, edited and published the Koniag Islander newsletter, and participated in enrollment, village certification, and lands selection. He became the corporation's executive vice president and chairman of the board of directors. He was also active in statewide Native affairs, serving as a member of the Alaska Federation of Natives board of directors and as vice president of the Tundra Times, a statewide Native newspaper. A close associate of his has said, "Time will prove Karl to be one of the foremost and dedicated leaders of the Native movement and the regional corporations as a whole."

I had the pleasure of serving with Karl in the State government when he was director of information for the State of Alaska and special assistant to Gov. Walter Hickel.

Karl's efforts were officially recognized last week when the KANA board of directors unanimously nominated him to the Alaska Federation of Natives to be AFN Citizen of the Year.

Alaskans shall all remember Karl Armstrong. Indeed, it will be hard to forget him as we look around at the result of his efforts for the State and the people of Alaska.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

BACKING THE VOICE OF AMERICA

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, again I bring to my colleagues' attention the dire state of transmitting facilities at the Voice of America and the extreme need to improve conditions at VOA.

The list of inadequacies due to insufficient staffing and decrepit transmitting facilities is long. For instance, the VOA has only six 500-kilowatt superpower transmitters, all of which are patched together from 250-kilowatt transmitters. In contrast, the Soviet Union has 37 modern superpower transmitters, France 11, West Germany 9, and Great Britain 8. Because of lack of transmitter time and inadequate staffing, VOA's hours of broadcasting do not reflect America's place and influence in the world. VOA broadcasts 956 hours per week in 42 languages. The U.S.S.R. broadcasts 2,158 hours in 82 languages; China, 1,430 in 43 languages; West Germany, 787 in 37; and the United Kingdom, 721 in 36.

VOA has proposed a long-term modernization program, as the GAO has recommended. This program includes the replacement of antiquated facilities, hiring of programing personnel to eliminate the critical staff shortages and improve quality of VOA broadcasts, and installing important computer equipment.

In urging passage of the supplemental request last December, President Reagan wrote to key Members of Congress that—

It is vital that we undertake initiatives now for the modernization and strengthening of our international radio broadcasting operations. The time has come to give these operations—for too long systematically underfunded and neglected—the attention they deserve. Particularly at this time of critical change in the Communist world, having these improved capabilities as soon as possible is a matter of vital national interest.

Just this month, the President reiterated this conviction. I request that the President's September 10 radio address remarks to the Nation be inserted in the RECORD at this point, to be followed by a New York Post article urging support of VOA's modernization program.

The material follows:

RADIO ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT TO THE NATION

My fellow Americans: During my first press conference, nine days after being sworn in as your President, I was asked a question having to do with Soviet intentions. In my answer, I cited their own words, that they have openly and publicly declared the only morality they recognize is what will further world communism, that they reserve unto themselves the right to commit any crime, to lie, to cheat, in order to attain that. And I pointed out that we should keep this in mind when we deal with them.

I was charged with being too harsh in my language. I tried to point out I was only quoting their own words. Well, I hope the Soviet's recent behavior will dispel any lingering doubt about what kind of regime we are dealing with and what our responsibilities are as trustees of freedom and peace. Isn't it time for all of us to see the Soviet rulers as they are rather than as we would like them to be.

Rather than tell the truth about the Korean Air Lines massacre, rather than immediately and publicly investigate the crash, explain to the world how it happened, punish those guilty of the crime, cooperate in efforts to find the wreckage, recover the bodies, apologize and offer compensation to the families, and work to prevent a repetition, they have done the opposite. They have stonewalled the world, mobilizing their entire government behind a massive cover-up, then brazenly threatening to kill more men, women and children should another civilian airliner make the same mistake as KAL 007.

The Soviets are terrified of the truth. They understand well and they dread the meaning of St. John's words, "You will know the truth, and the truth will set you free." The truth is mankind's best hope for a better world. That's why in times like this, few assets are more important than the Voice of America and Radio Liberty, our primary means of getting the truth to the Russian people.

Within minutes of the report of the Soviet destruction of the Korean jet, the Voice of America aired the story in its news programs around the globe. We made sure people in Africa, Asia, the Middle East, Europe and, most important, the people in the Soviet Bloc itself knew the truth. That includes every Soviet misstatement, from their initial denials through all the tortured changes and contradictions in their story, including their UN representative still denying they shot down the plane even as his own government was finally admitting they did.

Accurate news like this is about as welcome as the plague among the Soviet elite. Censorship is as natural and necessary to the survival of their dictatorship as free speech is to our democracy. That's why they devote such enormous resources to block our broadcast inside Soviet-controlled countries. The Soviets spend more to block Western broadcasts coming into those countries than the entire worldwide budget of the Voice of America.

To get the news across to the Russian people about the Korean Air Lines massacre, the Voice of America added new frequencies and new broadcast times. But within minutes of those changes, new Soviet jamming began. Luckily, jamming is more like a sieve than a wall. International radio broadcasts can still get through to many people with the news. But we still face enormous difficulties.

One of the Voice of America's listeners in the Middle East wrote: "If you do not strengthen your broadcasting frequencies, no one can get anything from your program." Our radio equipment is just plain old, some of it World War II vintage. I don't mind people getting older; it's just not so good for machines.

More than 35 percent of the Voice of America's transmitters are over 30 years old. We have a similar problem at Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. We have 6 antiquated 500-kilowatt shortwave transmitters. The Soviets have 37, and theirs are neither old nor outdated. We regularly receive complaints that Soviet broadcasts are clearer than ours. One person wrote and asked why it's not possible for a Nation that can send ships into space to have its own voice heard here on earth.

The answer is simple. We are as far behind the Soviets and their allies in international broadcasting today as we were in space when they launched Sputnik in 1957.

We have repeatedly urged the Congress to support our long-term modernization program and our proposal for a new radio station, Radio Marti, for broadcasting to Cuba. The sums involved are modest, but for whatever reason this critical program has not been enacted.

Today I am appealing to the Congress, help us get the truth through. Help us strengthen our international broadcasting effort by supporting increased funding for the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, Radio Liberty, and by authorizing the establishment of Radio Marti.

And I appeal to you, especially those of you who came from Eastern Europe, Russia, and Soviet-dominated countries, who understand how crucial this issue is, let your representatives hear from you. Tell them you want Soviet rulers held accountable for their actions even by their own people. The truth is still our strongest weapon. We just have to use it.

Finally, let us come together as a Nation, tomorrow is a National Day of Mourning, to share the sorrow of the families, and let us resolve that this crime against humanity will never be forgotten anywhere in the world.

Until next week, thank you for listening, and God bless you.

[From the New York Post]

MOSCOW FEARS OUR VOICE—LET US MAKE IT STRONGER

Secretary of State George Shultz says the Soviet Union's paranoid form of government is a system which fears foreign radio broadcasts even more than it fears missiles.

There is no need to tell that to the Voice of America.

If ever there were proof that President Reagan should ask Congress to give the VOA the tools with which to do its job it was provided by the Korean airliner tragedy.

The Soviets intensified their jamming to block every attempt by the VOA to broadcast Washington's meticulously detailed version of the shooting down of the airliner—including the shocking tapes of the Soviet pilots actually firing their missiles.

By straining every available resource the VOA managed to pierce the Soviet jamming. It brought in equipment that was in need of maintenance. It boosted the power of foreign transmitters beyond their normal levels. It will be able to keep up its present stepped-up rate of 17 hours of broadcasts a day to the Soviet Union, however, for only another week.

The VOA was helped in getting its broadcasts through by prevailing conditions. Jamming is difficult during twilight periods in the summer months of northern Europe.

There are places in Moscow and other East European cities where people go specifically during those periods to hear the few VOA and other Western broadcasts which get through.

We pointed out here last week that the Soviet action in shooting down the Korean airliner had already proved to be a huge defeat for Moscow's prolonged campaign to present the Soviet government as "peace-loving" and the United States as a threat to peace."

The defeat would have been more substantial and more lasting if the VOA were not handicapped by inadequate funds and obsolete equipment.

The Soviets spend more money jamming the VOA and other Western broadcasts than the VOA's budget to broadcast to the entire world.

The Soviets have 37 high-powered 500-kilowatt shortwave transmitters. The VOA has six make-shift affairs, clobbered together from 250-kilowatt transmitters.

Further, many of the VOA transmitters in Washington, and its relay transmitters around the world, are more than 15 years old.

Anyone who travels abroad and listens to a shortwave radio knows the result of this cheeseparing in Washington. The airwaves are flooded with Soviet and Eastern European propaganda broadcasts.

Indeed, the Soviets are on the air around the world in 82 languages for 2157 hours a week.

By contrast, the VOA broadcasts in only 42 languages for a total of only 956 hours.

As a result, many countries which should be receiving an American version of what is going on get only an hour or so of information daily.

The VOA broadcasts for only an hour a day to Laos, for 1½ hours to Bulgaria and Cambodia, for 1 hour 50 minutes to Yugoslavia and the Baltic states—Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania—seized by the Soviet Union after World War II. It broadcasts for only 1½ hours in Pashtu and a further 1½ hours in Dari to Afghanistan—compared with round-the-clock propaganda by the occupying Soviet Forces.

The worst result of Washington's penny-pinching is in the paucity of VOA broadcasts to Central and South America. It broadcasts for only 5½ hours a day in Spanish to that area. The Soviets broadcast in nine languages for 19 hours and Cuba broadcasts in six languages right round the clock.

There is an urgent need for the Reagan Administration to change this dismal performance. The VOA has the leadership and the staff to deliver. All it needs are the tools.●

DAN HARLAN

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, it would be difficult to suggest two groups of people whose lives are more different than farmers and bureaucrats.

A farmer's life is clear and direct: Crops are planted and harvested, cows are milked; there is an endless pattern of chores and tasks which must be done with hard work and good cheer.

A bureaucrat's life revolves around paperwork, meetings, cost/benefits ratios, and tattered phone messages. The ultimate product is far less tangible than what a farmer produces. Bureaucrats can work on projects for years which amount to little more than sound and fury, signifying nothing. Most farmers have a friendly disdain for the daily grind which compromises the life of a bureaucrat. President Eisenhower put it well when he said, "Farming looks mighty easy when your plow is a pencil, and you're a thousand miles from the cornfield."

The government of the State of Maine is quite fortunate to have an employee who easily bridges the many gaps between farmers and the government. Dan Harlan, Maine's deputy commissioner of agriculture, has worked on behalf of Maine's farmers for 14 years. In that time, he has given of himself time and time again to help farmers understand the government and vice versa.

Last week, Dan Harlan received the 1983 honor award for excellence from the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture. The association could not have made a better choice. Talk to anyone even remotely involved in farming or government in Maine, and they will all tell you the same thing: No one does it better than Dan.

I have a great deal of respect for Dan Harlan as a professional. But I will also confess to having a personal interest as well. One of Dan's four daughters, Rachel, serves as the assistant chief clerk of the Senate Subcommittee on Oversight of Government Management, of which I am chairman, and she performs her duties with the same quiet professionalism as her father. Dan's youngest daughter, Natalie, worked this summer as the receptionist in my Senate office and also was extremely competent and friendly. They are apples who have fallen very close to the tree.

David Bright, of the Bangor Daily News, wrote a profile of Dan recently, and I ask that the article be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that my colleagues can learn more about Dan Harlan, a patient and professional bureaucrat who has come to have the trust and respect of a very independent group of people, the farmers of Maine.

The article follows:

DAN HARLAN: ALWAYS A HELPING HAND

(By David Bright)

Whenever they decide at the Maine Department of Agriculture it's time to pray for rain, they turn to Dan Harlan, but not because he's an ordained minister.

Last week Harlan deputy commissioner of the department received the 1983 Honor Award for Excellence in Administration from the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture. It was an award he has surely earned.

For 14 years Harlan has been the answer to the question, the solution to the dilemma, at the Maine Department of Agriculture. He was the predominant—if not the divine—guidance behind the metamorphosis of the "old" department (a/k/a Department of Farmer Regulation) into the Maine Department of Agriculture, Food and Rural Resources, a too-long name which loosely translates to friend of the farmer.

Now those who this week have been digging inch-and-seven-eighths potatoes might not agree, but the state ag department as currently established is truly dedicated to strengthening Maine agriculture and much of the credit for that belongs to Harlan.

It is perhaps a comment on the subtle way he goes about his job that the only photograph of him in the NEWS files was over 10 years old which is why his friends may think Tom Hennessey's portrayal doesn't quite capture that greyed and wisened air Dan now carries with him.

In the illustration, Hennessey added a farm background, something Harlan came into government service without. The son of a minister, be grew up in Ohio, and then lived in Alaska before coming to Maine. He served several congregations aluations in Maine, most recently Greene Street Methodist in Augusta. He became associated with the department while doing a potato transportation study, and while he now works full-time for the state, it isn't uncommon to find him putting in a guest appearance at church while the regular minister is ill or on vacation.

At the Department of Agriculture, Harlan's forte has always been knowing how to help, and he quickly became known as the person to see when answers were needed.

To a reporter covering agriculture, Harlan is invaluable, especially when it's discovered late in the afternoon there's a key detail missing from the story. A call to Harlan will produce the answer, even if it means he has to stay after hours getting it.

The department recently got a new information officer, Bob Deis, who's also heads up when it comes to news. But it's a good bet Deis turns to Harlan when he's really got to find something fast.

The Maine Department of Agriculture, et al, is, in fact, one place in Dome City's where the beat goes on after the clock has stopped. It is not uncommon to find both Harlan and his boss, Commissioner Stewart Smith, still at their desks long after the janitor has gone home.

It was not until the department's reorganization that the post of deputy commissioner was created, but Harlan has held that position on a de facto basis for some time. In the last two transitions he served as acting commissioner.

When asked if he'd mind seeing in print the statement that Dan Harlan really runs the department, Smith jokes that he guesses that wouldn't upset him too much.

In truth, Smith and Harlan run the department together, sharing the responsibilities, the praise, and the heat. Smith, as the gubernatorial appointee, is the one out front, making the headlines and suffering the stings and arrows of outraged farmers—or anti-spray advocates—who want to take a poke at state government.

As his minister's training would suggest, Harlan takes the quiet path. He is the one who gets the delicate tasks. He is the negotiator, the bridge builder.

And it is Dan Harlan who can walk through the shadow of the Valley of the Legislature and fear no evil perhaps the greatest of his many talents.

It is the Legislature where the job of state government really gets done, and Smith can impose rules and regulations, promote markets and work to conserve farmland only if the Legislature says so.

If you assume for a minute that the Legislature is the sum total of all knowledge, that means each individual solon has a grip on only one one-hundred-and-eight-fourth of the whole story. It is Dan Harlan's task, therefore, to put together enough fractions—and factions—to produce support for the programs he and Smith need. Harlan does so by operating calmly, always sure of himself. He likes people and he can bring them together to work for a common goal, be they legislators, farm leaders or just plain folks.

Regardless of who is the incumbent commissioner of agriculture it's easy to find someone who doesn't like him. That's the nature of holding a political job. In the past 14 years there have been those who despised Maynard Dolloff, detested Joe Williams and downright hate Stew Smith.

But you'll have to travel far and wide to find someone who doesn't like Dan Harlan. He's a friend to anyone who's a friend of Maine agriculture.

Especially those who have to pray for rain every once in a while.●

WISCONSIN NATIVE GETS HER STAR

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise today to salute a Wisconsin native whose promotion to the rank of Brigadier General in the U.S. Army was approved last week by the Senate. What is really unusual about this promotion, although it should not be, is that Connie Slewitzke of Mosinee, Wis., has become only the second female active duty general in the Army today.

Ever since her childhood days, General Slewitzke had dreamed of becoming a nurse. After completing her training at St. Mary's Hospital School in Wausau, she realized her dream as she worked in hospitals from Wisconsin to California.

But she had another dream: the dream of seeing the world. What better way to see the world, she thought, than to serve her country through the Army Nurse Corps. Indeed, she not only served in the United States, but she also served in Europe, Korea, and Vietnam. Now that her remarkable career of 26 years has been duly recognized through promotion, she will now serve as the chief of that same Army Nurse Corps.

Mr. President, Gen. Connie Slewitzke serves as an inspiration, not only to the thousands of other women who have made the military the focal point of their lives, but to us all. She is proof that with dedication, we can all realize the biggest of our dreams and attain the loftiest of our goals. I am proud of her achievements, and I am pleased to pay tribute to her distinguished service to her country.

I would also like to call to the attention of my colleagues an article on General Slewitzke which appeared in the Milwaukee Journal on September 24. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

WISCONSIN NATIVE GETS HER STAR

(By John W. Kole)

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Connie Slewitzke got her star Monday at a Pentagon ceremony marking here appointment as the Army's second female general on active duty.

Slewitzke, a 52-year-old native of Mosinee, Wis., officially became a brigadier general last week, when the Senate confirmed her as chief of the Army Nurse Corps.

The promotion was recognized Monday when Lt. Gen. Bernhard Mittemeyer, the army's surgeon general, symbolically gave Slewitzke her uniform stars.

A CHILDHOOD DREAM

In an interview, Slewitzke said she had wanted to be a nurse since her school days in Mosinee, a small community on the Wisconsin River south of Wausau.

Her father, the late Leo Slewitzke, operated a meat market there.

Slewitzke completed her nurse's training at the old St. Mary's Hospital School of Nursing in Wausau and worked in hospitals in Eau Claire, California and Chicago before deciding to join the Army.

Two of her sisters had once been in the Women's Army Corps.

"I decided to be an Army nurse because I wanted the opportunity to travel all over the world," she said. "And I liked the educational and retirement benefits."

Since joining the Army 26 years ago, she has had assignments all over the United States, including posts in Hawaii, plus two tours in Korea and service in Europe and Vietnam.

Her one-year stint in Vietnam in 1967 and 1968 was during some of the heaviest US military involvement there, but she did not see the worst cases because she was assigned to hospitals that specialized in evacuation and convalescence.

In her new post, Slewitzke will receive $63,468 a year in salary and allowances.

As chief nurse, she will supervise the activities of 4,000 Army nurses. 2,300 civilian nurses and 25,000 other full-time employees.

She also will have jurisdiction over 6,000 nurses who work part time in Reserve and National Guard units.

In December, she will preside over a strategic conference the corps has scheduled.

One of the advantages the corps offers, Slewitzke said, is a close working relationship with doctors—closer than the relationship usually found in private practice.

But, she said, "we aren't going to attract the people who don't want to travel or who want to stay in their home communities, and some people don't like the restriction of being subject to call."

Slewitzke got her bachelor's degree in nursing from the University of Maryland in 1971. A degree is now a requirement for all members of the corps.

A PHOTOGRAPHY BUFF

In her spare time, Slewitzke likes to travel and take pictures. One of her recent vacations was a photography safari to Africa.

Her plans are to retire after a four-year term as commanding officer, but she concedes that she could, at age 56, decide to continue work after that with a private concern.

Although her three sisters and a brother are in the Midwest—two in Mosinee, one in Barneveld, Wis., and one in Chicago—she does not plan to retire there.

Confessing to a lack of fondness for the Midwest's cold winters, she plans instead to head for Texas—probably the San Antonio area, where she still has many friends from her early days in the corps.

"I don't know if I'll be ready to really retire in four years," she said, "but whenever I go to Texas, I know I'll find lots of good friends there."●

REIMBURSEMENT FOR PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, the Department of Health and Human Services has recently completed 2 days of hearings on how reimbursement for prescription drugs would take place under a number of Federal programs.

I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the thoughtful remarks of the new president of the National Association of Retail Druggists, Mr. John A. Johnson. Mr. Johnson, a native of Bellevue, Nebr., has been a practicing druggist for 20 years. His comments bring a unique perspective to the problems of reimbursement for prescription drugs and I would urge my colleagues to review his comments carefully.

Mr. President, I ask that Mr. Johnson's remarks be included in the RECORD at this point.

The remarks follow:

STATEMENT OF MR. JOHN A. JOHNSON BEFORE THE U.S. DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES TASK FORCE ON REIMBURSEMENT FOR PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Task Force: [1] I am John A. Johnson of Bellevue, Nebraska. I serve as President of the National Association of Retail Druggists. Since 1963, I have owned and operated an independent retail pharmacy. Additionally, I served on the first PRAC Board. Thus, I have had ample opportunity to observe the pharmacy Medicaid program. My associate this morning is John M. Rector, Director of Government Affairs.

The National Association of Retail Druggists (NARD) represents owners of more than 30,000 independent pharmacies, where over 75,000 pharmacists practice their profession. Independents dispense more than 70 percent of the nation's prescription drugs. Together, they serve 18 million persons daily and provide nearly 85 percent of the Medicaid pharmaceutical services.[2] NARD has long been acknowledged as the sole advocate for this vital component of the free enterprise system.

NARD members are primarily family businesses. They have roots in America's communities. The neighborhood independent druggists typifies the reliability, stability, yet adventuresomeness that has made our country great. Unlike some in pharmacy academia, the independent advocates the basic tenants of the entire small business community: a fair profit and a return on investment.

As owners of independent pharmacies, our members are committed to legislative and regulatory initiatives designed to provide them a fair chance to compete. We appreciate the opportunity to appear before the Task Force and present our recommendations on the Department of Health and Human Services program, especially Medicaid.

We believe that one of the major strengths in the health care system is the thousands of independent community pharmacies readily accessible to virtually every segment of the population. In many areas this segment of the health care community represents the most accessible form of health care. In too many areas, particularly large urban areas, the retail druggist represents the only available health care professional. Any revisions in the Medicaid health care program should capitalize on the strengths of the existing retail distribution network for drugs. This network provides maximum access and professional services unknown to non-professional government dispensaries or mail-order vendors. In many areas with high Medicaid utilization, we independents are the only health professional.

In contrast to most, if not all other medical services delivery systems, competition in retail pharmacies is alive and well. Not only have prescription drug price increases been well below the general consumer price index for the past two decades, but they are significantly below the increases for every other medical care service reimbursed by Medicaid.

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX FOR MEDICAL CARE ITEMS IN THE UNITED STATES

Calendar year	All medical care items	Physicians' fees	Dentists' fees	Hospital room	Prescription drugs	Over the counter drugs
1967	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0
1972	132.5	133.8	132.3	173.9	100.9	111.3
1977	202.4	206.0	185.1	299.5	122.1	148.5
1982	328.7	327.1	283.6	556.7	192.7	234.2

We maintain this is significant evidence that independents, who are filling 70 percent of the nation's prescriptions, have kept faith with the public and the government. We believe these results emphasize American competition is still a tribute to our democracy. Competition is an incentive for efficiency and the price competition in retail pharmacy is greater than that found among the other providers of health services.

PHARMACY REMITTANCE

Today, there are many problems confronting independent pharmacies which serve Medicaid patients. The fixed fee reimbursement, however, far overshadows other problems encountered by pharmacists participating in the Medicaid pharmacy program.[3]

States reimburse pharmacists on a product cost plus a dispensing fee basis. Fees are determined and fixed by state Medicaid agencies. States are required by HCFA regulations to conduct surveys of the cost of filling prescriptions; but since they are not required to use the survey findings, states are able to fix the dispensing fee on whatever basis they choose. It has been reported to us that many state Medicaid agencies are unaware of the exact division of responsibilities between the Federal government and the state government in this area. It is NARD's understanding that although the surveys must include consideration of data on operations, professional services, overhead and profit, the actual fee fixed by the state(s) need not reflect such components of the total cost of dispensing a prescription for retail. Our members doubt the sincerity of those responsible for this program since many states have never conducted the surveys or implemented their findings. In fact, we have been told that HCFA has never collected or reviewed the states' surveys. Little wonder it appears to many of our members that the regulation requiring the surveys were but another anti-small business maneuver—a cruel hoax—intended to perpetuate an inequitable fixed fee.

Exacerbating the failure of many states to use required surveys to provide pharmacists with adequate compensation for dispensing Medicaid drugs, is the fact that when used, it is not rare for dispensing fees to be three or more years out-of-date by the time any increase is granted. Providing an increase based on a three year old survey of then current costs hardly meets the pharmacists' needs.

To date, fixed fees have usually been established below the average dispensing cost. At the same time dispensing fees have been set far below pharmacists average cost ingredient price inflation by drug manufacturers continues unabated, and largely unchanged, thus, many of our members are providing both products and services at costs higher than Medicaid remittance.

You may have heard some suggest that pharmacy's number one concern with Medicaid is the Maximum Allowable Cost (MAC) Program.[4] Some manufacturers would certainly benefit by its repeal and drug wholesalers stand to profit significantly by the repeal of this cost-containment program since they, unlike the pharmacists bound by Medicaid programs, can increase profits because they are based on a mark-up of the product. Thus, by selling higher priced products, a wholesaler's profits significantly increase. This is not true in the pharmacy profession where a practitioner's reimbursement is locked into a fixed fee system and where the pharmacists' net profit decreases as product costs accelerate. Thus, pharmacists are being asked to maintain an inventory of high cost products with no adjustment in compensation for dispensing them. In periods of high interest rates this has a devastating consequence.

As a result of the fixed fee system the continued viability of independent pharmacists in areas with high concentrations of Medicaid recipients is put in jeopardy. The consequences of the demise of independents due to the fixed fee can best be understood through a review of the role of prescription products and services in health care other than Medicaid. As noted, this service is far more cost effective than other components in the health care system. Such cost effectiveness is a direct outgrowth of marketplace competition. Thus, the bottom line in non-Medicaid pharmacy programs is that marketplace pricing yields both cost effectiveness and quality preventive care.

A recent profile of NARD members found that 35 percent of their time is spent in direct patient consultation.[5] In fact, this is the hallmark of the independent pharmacist. It is also well documented that such activity by pharmacists increases patient drug compliance and reduces unnecessary, costly hospital and emergency room fees. Another recent study demonstrated that thousands of dollars per patient are saved annually

[1] Task Force: Deputy Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation/Health, Robert Helms, Ph.D., Chairman; Public Health Service Deputy Assistant Secretary for Health Planning, Glenna Crooks, Ph.D.; Deputy General Counsel for Regulations, Terry Coleman; and Health Care Financing Administration Reimbursement Bureau Director, Larry O'Day.

[2] In 1982, independents filled 1,039,893,000 and chains filled 421,989,000 prescriptions of the total prescriptions (1,461,822,000) filled in the U.S. The average prescription price in 1982 for independents was $8.22 and for chains $8.29. Of the 210,493,000 prescriptions filled under the Medicaid program, chains filled 34,849,000 and independents filled 175,644,000. See American Druggist prescription survey, May 1983.

[3] NARD Survey, Medicaid: Fixed Fees Hurt the Worst, July 1983:

Results of the NARD Newsletter survey confirm that, of seven different aspects of the Medicaid program, fixed fees levy the heaviest burden on independent retail pharmacists. Once again, NARD members ranked fixed fees the number one Medicaid problem. MAC prices were ranked number one by only 13 percent of respondents. Both paperwork and delayed reimbursement were pegged number one more frequently than MAC prices.

Overall, the Medicaid program is either a serious or a somewhat serious problem in the daily operations of 81 percent of our respondents. This finding is corroborated by the sheer volume of mail the survey provoked—the largest survey response in 15 years.

[4] In the past NARD has expressed its concern with whether MAC drugs were available to independent retail druggists at the MAC prices. This problem involved both a question of the general availability of the specific drug on a national basis and the fact that MAC pricing in many instances were based on purchases in sizes greater than that normally used by independents.

[5] The NARD Pharmacy Study, Healthcare Communication, Inc., Fort Washington, Pa; March, 1983.

when the pharmacist is not stifled in delivery of services by the fixed fee.

Services such as 24-hour emergency prescription service, free delivery, maintenance of patient medication profiles, and direct patient consultations are given no value according to state Medicaid bureaucrats. Yet, Medicaid patients expect and should be able to receive and depend upon these services, the same as cash-paying customers. By not recognizing these services in Medicaid reimbursement to the pharmacist, the Medicaid agency relegated the Medicaid recipient to the status of a second class citizen or else seeks to tax pharmacists by expecting them to provide these services gratis.

Thus, in stark contrast to the exemplary record of pharmacy in the marketplace, the Medicaid pharmacy reimbursement scheme works as a disincentive. The professional services, which yield greater levels of consumer drug compliance resulting in fewer experiences with the more costly components of health care delivery, are denied to Medicaid recipients.

To add insult to injury, after pharmacists fill prescriptions and submit claims to the state, they must wait for reimbursement and wait and wait. HCFA has promulgated regulations requiring states to pay 90 percent of all "clean" claims within 30 days. However, since these regulations have no enforcement provisions, when a state runs out of money, as a number of states have, pharmacists are being asked to continue underwriting the Medicaid system until money becomes available. Because of a shortfall in one state budget, for example, pharmacists were recently reimbursed only 85 percent of the total dollar amount of their claims. The normal delay in payment in Medicaid programs also increased the costs of those programs to independents. This is particularly true in times of high interest rates when borrowings to cover cash flow may eliminate and profit.

Medicaid was designed to provide health care to those who could not afford it and to allow reasonable profit for the providers of services. Certainly, Medicaid has seriously shortchanged pharmacy providers. It is equally important, however, to emphasize that in turn, through inappropriate reimbursement, the states have likewise shortchanged others: (1) the Medicaid recipient; (2) the patients who pay cash for pharmacy services who experience increased personal expenses through the cost shifting (a form of indirect taxation is little understood by your constituents); and (3) the taxpaying public who eventually underwrite an increase in total public health costs due to unnecessary utilization of hospitals, physicians, and emergency room services.

IS THERE A BETTER WAY?

We believe there is a better way. NARD has established the following criteria for a successful Medicaid pharmacy program:

a. The program should not disrupt the present cost effective drug-distribution system which has provided our nation the best health care record in the world;

b. Medicaid recipients must not be relegated to second class health care either through denial of freedom of choice or indirectly through a pharmacy fixed fee system which fails to recognize services available to other citizens and therefore denies them to the Medicaid patient;

c. The program should reject disgraceful discrimination against small business;

d. Any alleged savings in Medicaid appropriations must be real, not merely the result of a shell game which shifts additional economic burdens to pharmacy providers, non-Medicaid providers, or the public; and

e. The Medicaid payment for pharmacy services must include an economic index percentage at least comparable to the increase in ingredient cost.

Accordingly, our members support elimination of the fixed fee system and support legislation requiring states to pay marketplace prices [6] in the Medicaid pharmacy program. Marketplace pricing would not only assure that participating pharmacies receive appropriate payment but would be of particular benefit to Medicaid recipients who would then receive the same pharmaceutical services as private citizens. Additionally, NARD recomends a direct payment system for pharmacy products and services. The implementation of direct payment would address the second two most important concerns of NARD members participating in the Medicaid programs: delayed payments and excessive paperwork.

The high administrative cost of the pharmacy program, relative to the cost of other Medicaid programs could be greatly reduced through adoption of a direct payment plan. State Medicaid agencies now, in most cases, contract with a private company to administer the prescription drug program. Under the innovative Alabama pharmacy bank draft program,[7] the administrative cost per claim was less than one-third of the cost incurred by other states with traditional systems and attendent bureaucracies. In Alabama, under the instant pay program, pharmacists received reimbursement from the local bank upon presentation of a voucher. In addition to the significant savings for the state in administrative cost, this "instant pay" or direct payment approach eliminated the chronic problems associated with late Medicaid payments.

Adoption of the direct payment pharmacy draft would, as it did in Alabama, also result in the reduction of needless, though costly, paperwork and red tape. For pharmacists involved in Medicaid the potential benefit is particularly attractive. At NARD's 1982 Conference on Legislation, pharmacy leaders were shocked when former Deputy Administrator of HCFA, Paul Willging, reported that HCFA data revealed that 50 percent of the total Medicaid paperwork is generated by the unnecessary bureaucracy which administers the pharmacy program. This is in context of a program which accounts for less than six percent of the total Medicaid budget. Important to pharmacists, however, is the fact that in most states, if not all, the pharmacy fee share of that six percent is approximately one-fourth, and falling dramatically with ever-increasing drug prices.

NARD also submits that marketplace pricing and direct payment would enhance competition and encourage prudence amongst Medicaid recipients, and lastly that fraud and waste made possible solely because of the unnecessary, complex way in which the program has been implemented would be eliminated.[8]

MEDICAID COPAY

In 1982, Congress established a Medicaid copay designed, according to the conference report, to allow states to deter unnecessary utilization while not imposing an unreasonable hardship on beneficiaries. Yet, under this approach no Medicaid provider may deny care or services to an individual because of inability to pay the required cost-sharing charges!

In retail pharmacy this provision, as interpreted by HCFA, has created a furor. As a practical matter, all recipients can avoid the copayment and thus avoid the 1982 congressional objective. Further, HCFA employees are incorrectly informing state officials and pharmacy providers that, the copayment differential must be absorbed by the pharmacy providers. Understandably, states are rejecting or deleting copay for prescription drugs, a result which we suggest is opposite that intended by of the 97th Congress.

NARD recommends the repeal of this section (Section 1916C). The section falls far short of what Congress intended and any so called cost savings will come directly out of the pockets of pharmacists who are already shortchanged by Medicaid. If implemented, the inherent danger of this copay forgiveness is that it will very likely bankrupt pharmacy providers and, therefore, the Medicaid pharmacy program.

CONCLUSION

Pharmacy products and services have helped to cut hospital, nursing home, and physician costs and continue to be the most cost-effective component of the health-care delivery system. To improve the Medicaid pharmacy program, it is essential that the competition responsible for the successful cost-effective private distribution system be incorporated into the Medicaid program. The fixed fee is not a professional fee. It is an insult to the pharmacy profession and to Medicaid recipients. It should be rejected.

The use of adequate incentive programs can save a great deal of money to the various Medicaid programs. However, the only way these will work is by having the practicing pharmacist help in their design. There is a great untapped wealth of knowledge and experience in the health marketplace: the working pharmacist. The entire Medicaid program can benefit. If we work together with mutual trust, and respect for that experience under the shackles of an often-confusing program, with pharmacists' help, there can be cost savings and benefits to the Medicaid program; and we stand ready to provide that help.

NARD seeks the support of the Task Force. We believe our recommendations are [6] That marketplace pricing be defined as that charge for dispensing prescriptions reflecting all current operating costs, a reasonable profit and a return on investment. NARD Statement of Positions, January, 1983.

[7] In 1976, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare recognized the accomplishments of this program and presented the state an award with the following citation: "In recognition of demonstrating extraordinary awareness and front-end management in the development and implementation of an innovative bank draft system of drug payments that has significantly reduced many problems experienced by other states."

[8] In the event marketplace pricing is not immediately established, NARD also supports the following steps:

a. Full implementation of the "cost of filling a prescription service" survey;

b. Interest and penalties for late Medicaid payment;

c. Compensation for the variety of services, including patient profiles and 24-hour delivery, that are provided by professional pharmacies;

d. Reinstatement of the 60-day public notice for state changes in the Medicaid reimbursement method or level of reimbursement; and,

e. Most importantly, a HCFA demonstration project, preferably statewide, designed to perfect the NARD direct payment/marketplace pricing pharmacy concept.

f. Payment to Medicaid pharmacy providers of a percentage of the cost of a product.

sound and workable. We look forward to working with you in the refinement of these proposals with the aim of making the Medicaid pharmacy program more cost effective and assuring that Medicaid recipients are provided quality pharmaceutical products and services.●

REMARKS OF ANTHONY M. SOLOMON, PRESIDENT OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BANK, BEFORE THE ECONOMIC CLUB OF NEW YORK

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I want to call the Senate's attention to an important speech delivered on September 20 by Anthony M. Solomon, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

Most public discussion of international lending and capital flows recently has focused on short-term steps needed to handle the immediate debt service problems confronting certain developing countries. Mr. Solomon's speech takes a longer term perspective in focusing on the actions needed to avoid a recurrence of today's problems while, at the same time, preserving a market-oriented international financial system.

The staggering economic costs to our economy that would accumulate over the years from failure to address the problems outlined by Mr. Solomon can be glimpsed by looking at the costs of the debt crisis to the U.S. economy in 1982 alone: $10 billion in lost exports, 300,000 lost jobs, and $1 billion in lost profits.

Critics of legislation now before Congress to increase the U.S. contribution to the International Monetary Fund allege that this would "bail out" commercial banks that have made unwise foreign loans. Such a conclusion is simply incorrect. Loans by the IMF are contingent upon additional commercial bank lending; they cannot be used to reduce aggregate outstanding bank loans.

Such unfounded criticism of the IMF quota increase also diverts attention from the key long-term issues surrounding international lending and capital flows. As chairman of the Banking Committee, I have a particular interest and responsibility in the proper role of commercial banks in these processes.

Mr. Solomon's speech is important because of what it has to say on this subject. He is correct in his conclusion that long-term capital investments in developing countries should not be financed with commercial bank loans funded with short-term deposits.

Mr. Solomon also is correct in his conclusion that Government agencies should not be substituted for the private sector in allocating funds for international capital investment; the loss in efficiency would be too great.

Mr. Solomon believes that new financial instruments are needed to finance international capital flows, and I agree. Such financial innovation is needed to protect our commercial banks as well as to protect our exports and domestic jobs.

I commend Mr. Solomon's speech to the Members of the Senate because his comments intelligently address a subject that is not receiving sufficient attention: how our international financial system should evolve over the long term. I ask that his remarks be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

REMARKS BY ANTHONY M. SOLOMON, PRESIDENT, FEDERAL RESERVE BANK OF NEW YORK

I feel certain that a great many of you here tonight—and, in fact, thoughtful people throughout the business and financial community—have been following the twists and turns of the LDC debt problem extremely closely over the past year or so. The press and other media have provided extensive coverage. And there have been several excellent analyses of how the debt problems came about, both in general and for individual countries. Overall, I conclude that public understanding of the current situation is unusually good, given the enormous complexity of the issues at stake.

What I think is less familiar, and worthy of more attention, is the discussion of what the world will be like after the current emergency is behind us. We all want to feel confident that, when something closer to normal circumstances is restored, we will have built a stronger, more resilient international financial system. No one wants a recurrence of debt disturbances like those of the past year. No one wants prolonged stagnation or inadequate growth in the developing countries of Latin America and elsewhere. That would worsen our own growth prospects and inhibit world trade. And prolonged stagnation—as distinct from the temporary setbacks associated with emergency adjustment programs—would raise a greater danger of serious social and political consequences in a number of the LDCs.

Before discussing the post-emergency period, I must make clear that I'm not complacent about the immediate task of completing the necessary debt restructurings and carrying through basic economic adjustments. We have to make sure we sustain the kind of concerted effort by all the principal participants which has yielded the tentative progress that's been made so far. The borrowing countries, the commercial banks, the governments in the industrial countries, and the International Monetary Fund have all had to make tough decisions and hard compromises. In particular, I think we should respect the painful measures that have already been taken and the sacrifices that have been endured by Mexico and some other countries. Under IMF guidance, these countries have, by any reasonable standard, made impressive efforts to adjust. But more hard work and political will must be marshalled, and more new financing will be required, before anyone can afford to relax.

Obviously, this concerted effort must go forward and must succeed. But make no mistake about it. That can't happen unless the IMF can continue to play the pivotal role it has in binding together the different parts of this effort. And the Fund will be unable to play that role if it's starved of adequate financial resources and political support.

Frankly, I find it baffling that there are elements in this country, and especially in our Congress, who can ignore the catastrophic effects that would result from not acting now to make resources available to the IMF quickly. Without the IMF at the pivot, the whole debt restructuring effort would be undermined, and needed new credits would be blocked. Outright defaults could actually happen. In the longer run, the consequences could also be grave. Debtor countries could be forced into disorderly adjustments that would almost certainly include more protectionist measures, credit controls, price distortions, and severe damage to local private sectors. It would injure the world trading system and seriously impair the prospects for economic growth, not only in the debtor countries but here and everyhere else.

The direct cost to the United States alone would be enormous. Until last year, our exports to LDCs that now have debt servicing problems had been averaging $50 billion a year—almost a quarter of our total exports. Already last year, exports to these countries fell by over $10 billion (more than 20 percent), costing us nearly 300 thousand jobs and $1 billion in profits. How can it be rational for this country to risk giant price tags like these in the future and oppose the quota increase?

I know that there are those who don't see it this way. Some look at the issue entirely in narrow financial terms and conclude that the IMF can squeak by without the quota increase for the time being. That view is wrong, and it misses the central point. In the absence of clear, unequivocal support for the institution by the United States government, including the Congress, the Fund will be permanently crippled.

What's even more baffling is that, among those who would cripple the Fund, there are people who claim to be strong advocates of free markets. What they entirely fail to see is that the IMF, in its efforts to get countries to pursue market-oriented policies and to minimize the hodge-podge of distortions that undermine economic performance, is the best friend that market-oriented people have in the kind of world we live in.

My strong sense is that the misguided opposition to the IMF quota legislation, and the mischievous amendments that undercut it, will not prevail. I believe that ultimately the Congress will support the IMF and act positively to meet the international responsibilities of the United States. It is both in our own immediate and longer term interest.

Suppose that we all do what we need to do in the short-term. Then, it's worth raising the question of what kind of economic prospects the LDCs, especially in Latin America where the debt burden is greatest, can look forward to in a couple of years when the immediate emergency is behind, but not forgotten. Can they return to rates of economic growth that are reasonably satisfactory and broadly meet their aspirations for achieving social and political progress? I don't want to put specific numbers on this, because growth potential differs from one country to the next. But I am talking about growth rates that would not be too far below the historical experience of most of the countries before the debt problems materialized.

It seems to me that it is certainly not impossible to get that outcome. But we have to face reality. There are going to be continuing constraints that will limit the scope for expansionary policies for some time to come. We can identify ways of easing some of these constraints and softening their impact. And we can be heartened by more optimistic developments lately in the industrial economies, where the prospects for higher growth seem to be improving. But there still must be an extended period in which the heavily indebted LDC governments are going to have very little margin for error.

The most obvious constraint will be with respect to external financing. Conventional commercial bank lending will be much harder to come by. In the first instance, that would limit countries' ability to import. And lower imports, particularly of capital goods, will hamper growth.

The natural question is whether that shortfall can be replaced by greater official assistance from industrial country governments. In my view, that is not likely. While government officials have the will and resources to provide temporary support in a crisis, there really isn't much chance of legislatures going along with increases in long-term official funding in amounts large enough to significantly offset lower commercial bank lending. After all, it was partly because of the difficulty of obtaining official financing that borrowing from banks grew so much in the first place.

Another question is whether the central banks of industrial countries—in particular, the Federal Reserve—should provide large-scale infusions of liquidity so as to ease credit availability for LDCs. Certainly, in a crisis, central banks have a traditional responsibility, as lenders of last resort, to insure stability. But any assistance of that sort must be strictly temporary. Central banks simply cannot be viewed as a source of medium and longer term financing.

So what's left? By process of elimination there are really only two alternatives: Either funds will have to find their way into LDCs through channels other than commercial banks, or borrowing countries will have to run their economies in ways that make them less dependent on external financing. In fact, the LDCs will have to move on both fronts at the same time if they hope to be able to achieve the satisfactory growth rates we are talking about.

Traditionally, direct investment has been an alternative to bank financing. In calmer times, greater direct investment inflows should be an effective source of capital. To be sure, we know that the internal political opposition to direct investment has been strident from time to time in the past and certainly could resurface as soon as the debt emergency starts to fade. Yet, it seems to me that this manifestation of economic nationalism must be challenged and overcome if the LDCs are going to be serious about economic development in a period when new borrowing from commercial banks is constrained.

Improving financial management offers another important way for borrowing countries to cope with the constraints they are going to face. This should especially include efforts to diversify the currency composition of a country's debt. By choice or by necessity, too much of the debt of many LDCs was in dollars. That left them vulnerable to a period of high dollar exchange rates and high dollar interest rates. We calculate that if from 1979 to 1982 developing countries had borrowed currencies in a diversified way—that is, in proportion to their import shares—the LDCs as a group would today be over $30 billion better off. I am not saying that kind of benefit can be repeated in any particular time period in the future. But the clear lesson is that a more balanced and skillfully drawn portfolio of debt is important. Of course, that requires not only a willingness of borrowers to diversify, but equally a willingness of market participants to modify their operations and of the authorities in other industrial countries to allow it.

In addition, both borrowers and lenders have an interest in taking some potentially valuable financial instruments off the drawing board and getting them to market. To take one example, perhaps commercial banks could shift at the margin toward originating loans and then selling them off into a secondary market, where price fluctuations could give useful, early disciplinary signals to borrowers. Or, to take another example, I can visualize variable maturity obligations that offer a constant debt service flow in the face of any unexpected jump in interest rates, a kind of built-in rescheduling. There may also be a place in the market for securities with the equity-like features, on which some part of the total yield to the investor could be calibrated, for instance, to the borrowing country's real GNP or export earnings growth, or some similar measure of economic performance.

Finally, there are a number of tools and techniques that are used by corporate borrowers here but are not yet being used by borrowers in developing countries. Just to give two illustrations, these instruments range from futures contracts to hedge against commodity fluctuations to interest rate swaps that can add another way of gaining fixed rate funding. In a period of restricted access to credit, it is worthwhile developing the expertise and sophistication to take advantage of the array of novel financing tools that are now available.

Innovations like those in the private capital markets would be helpful in ameliorating the financing problem. But I wouldn't want to overstate the role that these mechanisms can play. It will not eliminate the need for major changes and reforms in general economic policies so that dependence on external financing is lastingly reduced.

The way I see it there are three broad areas where policy reform in borrowing countries is called for to reduce dependence on external financing and promote domestic savings. After all, on average, gross domestic savings finance 90 percent of LDC investment.

The first is in the balance of payments area. It seems to me that heavily indebted developing countries have to be resolute in keeping their exports competitive in world markets. First and foremost, this means following realistic exchange rate policies and not letting the domestic currency get out of line. It also means realistic interest rates to deter damaging flight of domestic capital.

The second broad area is reform of government budgeting. To begin with, though it's getting harder for an American to preach to others on the subject, excessively large structural deficits have to be reduced. In addition, LDC governments must have tighter oversight of spending agencies, closer financial monitoring of projects, better and more timely budget numbers, and improved regulatory capabilities over their own financial institutions.

The third broad area is reform of the domestic price system. Every subsidy, every credit allocation scheme, every price distortion has to be tested against the standard of what it costs, both in budgetary terms and in terms of economic efficiency. These are long-standing problems that existed well before the debt crisis. And fixing any of them inevitably pits a government against powerful vested interests at home. But in the aftermath of the debt problem, there may be no alternative to meeting the task head on, because of the huge toll distortions take in limiting productivity and growth.

The governments in the industrial countries and the IMF both have to support LDC efforts to bring about market-oriented reforms and better financial management.

The industrial countries obviously have a major role to play in sustaining growth, in lowering global interest rates by reducing their own government deficits, and in keeping markets open for LDC goods. At the same time they have to open up their financial markets further so that the LDCs can diversify their sources of credit more effectively. They must help create a healthy world environment within which the LDC efforts can pay off.

As for the IMF, its role in managing crises is well recognized and indispensable. But treatment and cure are not enough; it must work harder and more effectively at prevention. What I see as close to being essential is that its surveillance role under more normal circumstances be enhanced. This has two dimensions:

First, the IMF should be assisting countries in improving their financial management. It can help them monitor their debts. It can work with countries to develop financial strategies covering the currency and maturity mix of borrowing as well as the degree of reliance on bank debt, bond finance, direct investment, and so on.

Second, appropriate IMF surveillance should extend well beyond matters of finance. The Fund is not just a lender. It is a force for promoting sensible policies. I believe it should put its weight behind governments which are committed to a transition toward more efficient domestic price, interest rate, and exchange rate policies. And it must reject the argument that the IMF should focus only on a balance of payments target, regardless of how it's achieved.

These broader efforts by the Fund should be an integral part of its regular consultations with all members. We don't want to go back to a situation where the IMF becomes deeply involved only after serious payments disruptions have occurred. That's too late.

Instead, a more continuous relationship would have some important advantages. It would improve the Fund's detailed knowledge of the constraints that regularly confront policymakers in each individual country. And it would provide a type of involvement by the Fund that might head off some of the resentment and occasional hostility that can occur when the IMF is seen as an outsider always prescribing austerity at a time of trouble.

To encourage movement in this general direction, I would go even one step further. It would be worthwhile considering whether access to funding could be made more readily available by the IMF to countries that voluntarily participate in these financial and economic policy reviews should they have a balance of payments need later on.

In summary, we must plan for a world of tighter financial constraints and less margin for error. The approach I am recommending boils down to a combination of stronger market institutions and better market instruments developing alongside better economic policies and stronger financial controls. In my approach, there is no quick fix. There is no single scheme or gimmick that will put things right and allow everybody to go back to business as usual. To the contrary, I feel that those debt reshuffling schemes that you hear about, which look to industrial country governments to pick up existing exposure from the banking system, are fanciful. They would be unjustifiably costly to the taxpayers. And in fact, they would give just the wrong signals, convincing people at home that a government bailout will always be there and whipping up pressures abroad in developing countries to ask for bailouts.

What I am recommending is rooted instead in pragmatism. It basically seeks to build a more resilient system on the best features of what we have now.

And what we have now pivots on the IMF. That is the institution which in practical terms binds the system together and which must play a more comprehensive role in the future. Therefore, the first step toward that kind of system is for the Congress to act quickly and positively on the IMF quota legislation and put to rest doubts about the commitment of the United States to a common sense, multilateral approach to dealing with the world's financial problems.●

BEST WISHES TO JOE McCAFFREY

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, Washington and the broadcasting industry will miss a familiar and respected voice with the departure of Joe McCaffrey's insightful commentaries, formerly carried on radio station WMAL.

This Senator from Kansas is surely joined by every Member of the Senate in wishing Joe the best of luck. We are glad his wisdom will still be available through Joe's weekly newspaper, the Culpeper News.

The Senator from Kansas asks that the RECORD include an article about Mr. McCaffrey from the September 29 edition of the Washington Times.

The article follows:

VETERAN JOE MCCAFFREY SIGNS OFF

(By Dennis John Lewis)

Say it ain't so, Joe. That was the tone of the many calls from radio listeners to WMAL-AM (630) last Friday upon hearing that veteran newsman/commentator Joseph McCaffrey would be leaving broadcasting.

The news came suddenly, as McCaffrey and WMAL had agreed it should, during the station's daily commentary spot. Although it wasn't announced at the time, Morrie Siegel has succeeded to the 5:45 p.m. timeslot. Siegel is well-known for his sports coverage at The Washington Star, WRC-TV, WJLA-TV and WRC radio.

McCaffrey, 68, expresses modesty and gratitude after being told of the affectionate reaction by WMAL listeners. "I hope people miss me. And I hope I was able to help straighten them out or shape their opinions in some way. That makes me feel good and, in another way, that makes me feel sad. But the nice thing is that now I can devote full time to my weekly newspaper, The Culpeper News."

There were no hard feelings between the commentator and the radio outlet as they parted. Though his sponsorship by GTE ran until the end of the year, the sponsor complained to WMAL that McCaffrey's commentary show no longer focused on Congress. Asked by WMAL officials two weeks ago when he would be willing to give up the show, McCaffrey said anytime. And the station executives suggested Sept. 23. "These things are inevitable," he rationalizes. "You are eventually going to come to the end of your rope. And if this satisfies them, then that's fine with me. I would just as soon have done the show until the end of the year. But if that's how it is, then that's okay."

After many years of "pointing with pride" or "viewing with alarm," the radio commentator says his true pride is rooted in his independent stands. "Probably the thing I'm proudest of over the years is that people haven't been able to figure out a label for me. They don't know if I'm liberal or conservative, Democrat or Republican. Sometimes I appeared to be on side of an issue and another time the other. But that's the way I wanted it. I vote no straight party lines. And former President Jerry Ford once said of me that I was the fairest reporter he ever dealt with—and I still cherish that remark."

On the negative side of the ledger, McCaffrey shrugs off those who had strong criticism of his opinion, often accusing him of being a liberal. "I suppose if I had the time and if I were mean enough, I could talk about some of the weird people that have attacked me over the years on the phone. I remember doing TV commentary during the integration turmoil in the South and getting copies of letters accusing me of being a communist with other copies of the letters sent to J. Edgar Hoover. So I know that somewhere at the FBI there is information there that I am not a true patriot."

But in more recent times, McCaffrey has been thought to be conservative, too. "I'm rather concerned now by the heavy uncontrolled immigration. And while years ago, I was accused of being a communist, I've lately been called a mossback." He doesn't hesitate to confess he's changed his mind on U.S. immigration policy. "I was always opposed to the immigration standards of 15 or 20 years ago. I was always for bringing people to this land. But over the last 10 years I've changed my mind. I feel we may at some point be overcome by an innundation of Asiatics and Latin Americans. Without being mean in any way, I think we should seriously consider why the House hasn't acted on the Simpson-Mazzoli bill which was passed twice by the Senate. Yet because of the pressure Hispanics are bringing to bear, which is much greater than their numbers, the House Democratic leadership has not acted."

McCaffrey usually avoided taking a stand on issues that could result in what he called "endless argument" topics. "When those topics come up, there's nothing you can do by taking either position because the debate just goes on and on. And really, there's nothing you can offer that could act as even a partial solution. So I always stayed away from those things. I'd rather get involved in something of greater immediacy."

Nevertheless, on his last broadcast, he couldn't resist the chance to criticize WMAL for both the music it plays and the vehemence of the station's frequent anti-handgun editorials. Labeling the station's "get-the-guns-off-the-streets" stance as "hysterical," McCaffrey added that the other point of view, as expressed by the National Rifle Association, is usually "paranoid."

His commentaries often related to community issues and sometimes served to involve him in speaking up for victims of individual injustice. McCaffrey says these instances yielded the greatest satisfactions. One case involved a doctor denied admission to a medical school because he was found to be over-age. Another concerned a policeman who lost his job as a result of an error. Both situations were reversed after McCaffrey stated his views.

Currently observing his 50th year as a reporter, Joe McCaffrey's strongest identification comes from his insightful coverage of the U.S. Congress. That coverage started in 1944 and ended a year ago. "I have to say I loved covering the Congress because it's truly the eye of the needle. And eventually everything comes through that eye."

"No matter what the issue, it always seems to come up to Capitol Hill. And though there are a great many issues—more than that you have a great many personalities. I've always felt that while we have a reputation for being a nation governed by law, we are actually governed by personality. That was true when I first started in journalism as a smalltown political reporter in Poughkeepsie, N.Y. and again, I was always dealing with people. I have since that time always tried to keep my reports on a people basis."

Explaining why he looked more toward personalities than to laws or issues, McCaffrey says, "For one thing, you can make these matters more clearly understood by your public by telling about the people and personalities. And I think the average person is much more interested in personalities than in an issue by itself. If you can relate the two together, I'd say you would do better."

Does he miss covering Congress? "I thought I would, but honestly I've covered it long enough. Besides, Congress is a different creature than the Congress that I knew originally and grew up with. It's much more mechanical today. I suppose it's computerized more. The newer members are not the warm one-on-one individuals that I used to meet years ago. Since 1970, I'd say the makeup of Congress has changed greatly. Now I readily admit they are more intelligent and better educated. But I feel there's a little something missing and that is the human touch. The majority of people on the hill today I feel are all for the people en masse. But I think they might well neglect the people next door to them."

As for the public's traditional low opinion of Congress, McCaffrey isn't optimistic that that will ever change. "Congress' greatest role is taking the heat for everything. People tend to blame Congress no matter what happens. That's why Reagan looked so miraculous in his first two years. He was fighting the battle against Congress and Congress is the big boogeyman to the people. The surprising thing is that most of the people who have a low opinion of congress usually know nothing of Congress as a whole and very little about their own member."

Asked about the idea that there are crooks in Congress, McCaffrey quips, "Some of my best friends have gone to jail. But, more seriously, I've always said not to worry about crooks in Congress or people embezzling money. The real concern in government should be focused on stupidity. There are just so many people who really don't have a full deck of cards to play with and yet they are involved in some of the decisions we eventually have to live by."

But is the public right to be concerned about crooks in Congress? "The attitude is wrong because any generalization is wrong.

And for every member who was indicted and sent to prison in the Abscam affair there were 75 or so to one whose records are clean. After 39 years of covering Congress I've known, say, probably 2,300 members of Congress. Most are sincere and hardworking. And if I disagreed with their politics, I respected them for having the guts to get out there as candidates, and take the stands they chose to take.

"Today it seems that it's getting harder and harder to get good people to run for political office. There's a general cynicism about public office and this is very unfair. And it's especially unfair to we voters because we are the ones who suffer if we don't get good grade people to hold public office."

Not surprisingly, McCaffrey has a cureall to recommend to Congress—better public relations. "You know, Congress is a kind of a strange thing to most people. Individually they seem all right but when you put them together, God-only-knows what will happen. They are an easy target. I've always thought Congress should have a spokesman who when these columnists attack it, this guy could say here's why that column is wrong and here's what Congress actually did. Rarely do Congressmen defend the institution. Instead, they usually want to defend themselves."

McCaffrey's 50-year career in journalism had very modest beginnings. "I was paid 10 cents an inch when I started out in Poughkeepsie; later I moved up to getting $5 a week. And eventually that became $15 when I was drafted in January 1941."

He says he felt no strong impulse to enter broadcasting in 1944, his first year on the air here for CBS Radio. "I've found that people's careers are determined more often than not by chance. I wanted to go to law school but I wasn't able to because of finances and in other ways. So I turned to my second choice, which started when I was a reporter on my high school newspaper.

"After I was mustered out of the service here at Walter Reed, a friend suggested I apply at WTOP. I did an audition and they accepted me. If it hadn't been for that, who knows? I might have gone back to Poughkeepsie and gone to embalming school."●

"A CHORUS LINE" MAKES BROADWAY HISTORY

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I wish to announce a splendid occasion taking place this evening. The American musical, "A Chorus Line" will become the longest running musical in the history of Broadway. Tonight's performance will be the 3,389th of this grand production surpassing the record of "Grease."

"A Chorus Line," conceived, directed, and choreographed by Michael Bennet, opened at the Shubert Theater July 25, 1975. This Pulitzer Prize winning drama is a fine representation of the American musical art form of the 20th century.

The play, an exposé of Broadway auditions, presents the job of a choreographer, his decisions, his frustrations, and his results. Zach, the choreographer, must choose a chorus of 8 drawn from a field of 17 applicants. By watching the applicants' dancing, and listening to their moving life stories, the audience develops a clear idea of just what a Broadway audition entails, with an emphasis on the sagas of neurosis and frustration of those involved.

After its opening in 1975, the musical proceeded to win almost every major award, a tribute to the work of all involved, including the Shubert Organization, which produced this show. The Shubert Organization is chaired by Gerald Schoenfeld and has Bernard Jacobs as its president. This outstanding work of art continues to add to the artistic richness and legacy of New York and Broadway. The immense success of this musical is a fine example of the many productions that provide a source of entertainment, maintaining New York as the cultural capital of the Nation.

Mr. President, I extend my best wishes to everyone involved in this splendid work of art. I wish them all many more years of success.●

HONORING GLADYS REED ROBINSON

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to honor Gladys Reed Robinson of Lansingburgh, N.Y. She has the unique ability of making things grow. She grows plants in her house, her yard, and her greenhouse. Gladys Robinson recently was honored by the Garden Writers Association of America for helping make the membership grow from fewer than 300 to over 1,000 people. The Garden Writers Association now represents 50 States, Canada, England, Africa, and South Australia.

Mrs. Robinson received the association's Distinguished Service Award at the annual meeting at Longwood Gardens, Kennett Square, Pa. She was given a standing ovation after a tribute by the group's president, Theodore R. Marston of West Chicago, Ill. She was first elected to membership in GWAA in 1959.

Mrs. Robinson has published in Gardeners' Chronicle in London and Farmers' Weekly in South Africa. She has written for Popular Gardening, Flower Grower, and Organic Gardening, among others. Mrs. Robinson is still writing short gardening articles for two publications. She later decided that publications were impractical to write because of the complications in cashing her foreign checks.

She has also put effort into working with the Second Avenue Association in the neighborhood beautification program.

Mrs. Robinson has done extensive research in horticulture. She has investigated the origins of Plectranthus oertendahli, a close relative of Plectranthus australis or Swedish Ivy. The plant she discovered looks like the familiar relative, but the leaves are not as shiny. Mrs. Robinson's unyielding commitment to the art of horticulture has contributed to knowledge which is of inestimable value to the people of New York.

A plant called Tansy has also interested Mrs. Robinson. She has done many things with this plant, such as baking bread and cookies and brewing Tansy for tea.

Mrs. Gladys Robinson must be commended on her superlative achievements in the last 20 years. Her perception of the value and worth of others and her innate and ingenuous concern for the enhancement and preservation of human dignity must not be overlooked. The State of New York praises Mrs. Gladys Robinson on her outstanding achievements. I think we can all learn a lesson from someone who works so diligently, for so long, and with such great success.●

TRIBUTE TO JOHN JOHNSON OF BELLEVUE, NEBRASKA

● Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, it has been said that, "To find a career to which you are adapted and then to work hard at it is about as near to a formula for success as the world provides."

I wish to draw my colleagues' attention today to an individual who, for three decades, has worked hard in his chosen field of pharmacy and who is unquestionably a success in his home community of Bellevue, Nebr.

This individual, Mr. John A. Johnson, recently capped his long career by serving a 1-year term as president of the National Association of Retail Druggists, which represents the owners of more than 30,000 independent pharmacies nationwide.

NARD is the sole advocate for this vitally important segment of the small business community. Its members serve more than 18 million people each day, dispensing 70 percent of the Nation's prescription drugs.

Mr. President, John Johnson is well suited to have served as president of such a group. He is a 1948 graduate of Creighton University School of Pharmacy in Omaha, Nebr., and has owned an independent pharmacy since 1963.

He had previously served NARD for 12 years in leadership posts including treasurer; first, third, and fourth vice president, and member and chairman of its executive board.

Closely identified with the community of Bellevue for more than 30 years, John has been credited with developing its business base as a city council member and chamber of commerce president.

He has been instrumental in assisting numerous small business owners in the areas of management and in raising capital with which to continue in business or to expand into other fields.

His other civic accomplishments include chartering a bank badly needed by local businesses and raising funds to build Midlands Community Hospital, where he dedicated many hours of service on its board of directors.

A regional delegate to the White House Conference on Small Business in 1979–80, John later was proclaimed the Small Business Administration's Family Owned Business Advocate of the Year for 1980.

His numerous professional honors include the NARD-Merck Service to Society Award, the Harland Lewis Memorial Award, and the Creighton University Alumni Merit Award.

Mr. President, testifying before a task force of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services shortly before completing his term as NARD president, John made the point that members of his group are primarily family business owners who have their roots in American communities.

"The neighborhood independent druggist," he said, "typifies the reliability, stability, yet adventuresomeness that has made our country great."

It occurs to me, Mr. President, that John Johnson typifies that same "reliability, stabililty, and adventuresomeness" that has made this country great.

I am proud to be able to call him a friend and I am sure my colleagues will want to join me in congratulating him on the completion of his term as president of the National Association of Retail Druggists.

He has indeed worked hard in his chosen field of pharmacy and found a formula for success in his hometown of Bellevue, Nebr.●

MEDICAL TECHNOLOGY

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, last spring Congress made a significant change in the way medicare reimburses hospitals for the health care they provide.

Congress replaced the retrospective cost reimbursement system that had been used since medicare was created in the mid-1960's with a payment system based on prospective rates.

This new prospective payment system will strongly encourage hospitals to lower their costs. No longer will hospitals have a financial incentive to provide more services than are necessary, or to perform more tests, or to extend a patient's length of stay.

Under the new system, hospitals will receive a flat payment per case. This payment will be based on a patient's diagnosis, not on the services a hospital provides.

This new payment method will work properly only if:

The payment levels for each diagnosis related group, or DRG, are set at a fair level;

The payment levels are allowed to increase over time as actual costs increase;

The various DRG categories are periodically recalibrated.

During the Finance Committee's work on the prospective payment plan, I proposed creating a Prospective Reimbursement Assessment Commission to address these issues.

I am pleased that such a commission was authorized.

The Commission will assure that the payment levels under the new system are consistent with the legitimate fiscal needs of hospitals. The Commission will collect and assess information about medical procedures, including regional variations in medical practice.

And the Commission will give special attention to treatment patterns that appear to involve excessively costly or inappropriate services that do not add to the quality of care provided.

The Commission, in conjunction with the HHS Secretary, will give special attention to updating existing DRG's, establishing new DRG's, and recommending new payment rates for specific DRG's as changes occur in technology and hospital resource consumption.

In short, there is no easy national solution to rising hospital costs. I want to make sure the prospective payment system recognizes that hospitals in Montana's small communities face different problems than do those in Manhattan, N.Y.

This Commission is designed to help us achieve this goal.

A recent article in the New England Journal of Medicine examines these issues, as well as the broader question of technology assessment. I ask the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

ANOTHER CHANCE FOR TECHNOLOGY ASSESSMENT

New forces on the political landscape, rooted largely in the economics of medical care, are pressing federal officials and private interests to develop more adequate mechanisms to assess the safety and efficacy of emerging medical technologies. One force stems from expressed congressional concern over the resistance of some third-party payers to finance liver transplantation because, the payers argue, its efficacy has not been sufficiently well demonstrated. A second force is represented by a draft report of an Institute of Medicine committee, which recommends creation of a private-public technology-assessment body. A third force, which will probably prove to be the most enduring, is the advocacy by technology manufacturers for a new, congressionally mandated technology-assessment commission.

At this time, support for the new entity, called the Prospective Payment Assessment Commission, derives most forcefully from the Health Industry Manufacturers Association. Its advocacy, which represents a sharp reversal in policy from its successful 1981 effort to kill the National Center for Health Care Technology, stems from a recognition that Medicare's new hospital-payment approach incorporates new incentives into the financial affairs of hospitals.

Under the previous cost-based payment approach, the additional hospital costs of new technologies were essentially covered by third parties; as a consequence, hospitals had no financial incentives not to adopt innovations and had every encouragement, from physicians who demanded the latest technologies, to do so. Under Medicare's new per-case payment approach, the adoption of cost-raising technology is not met with an automatic increase in revenues to cover the additional cost. New technology will have to compete with alternative uses of scarce hospital funds. The implications of this policy turnabout are obvious: with limited resources, hospitals will need to assess new technologies and the added costs of their operation and maintenance far more closely and will have to allocate resources with greater prudence.

Technology manufacturers fear that unless some effective counterweight is available, the Health Care Financing Administration, which is dominated by cost-control considerations, will not give adequate consideration to new technologies when it periodically adjusts Medicare prices in the future. (The Heath Industry Manufacturers Association has sought to enlist the influences of community, investor-owned, and teaching hospitals and organized medicine in this struggle, but so far these interests have not paid much attention. Their attitudes are likely to change after the Health Care Financing Administration publishes Medicare's new prospective hospital prices in the Federal Register about September 1.)

Several congressional staff members who were instrumental in designing the new prospective-payment law and shared this concern spoke to it by persuading Congress to create the new commission for assessment of prospective payment. The central staff figure was Robert Hoyer, a longtime staff member of the Senate Finance Committee. The commission's chief congressional advocate was Senator Max S. Baucus (D-Mont.). The commission, whose 15 members have yet to be named, will be charged by Congress with making recommendations to the Department of Health and Human Services (DHHS) on the appropriate payment rate for services rendered to Medicare patients. The commission also has responsibility for conducting assessments of medical technology and will provide Medicare with guidelines for appropriate patterns of health care. All these activities will be advisory.
